Mr. PAGE said, if gentlemen were satisfied that five dollars per day was enough to compensate them and defray their expenses, because they resided in a part of the Union where every thing was to be procured so much cheaper, they might receive that sum and leave the residue in the Treasury; by this means they would demonstrate their love of economy and disinterestedness.

Mr. VINING thought gentlemen who were satisfied with four or five dollars, might move to amend the clause, so as to make it read "not exceeding six dollars per day," and then they might charge as much less as they deemed prudent.

Mr. BOURNOR said, that whatever measures he supported, he did it upon principle, not from a desire of acquiring popularity; he was satisfied that six dollars per day was not extravagant compensation, but considering the situation of the country, and the delicacy of their own situation, he would vote for five dollars, and he thought it sufficient to secure men of ability. He asked the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. GERRY) if he expected the paltry consideration of getting a dollar a day more, was to induce men of abilities and integrity to come forward and render their country their services?

He admitted that many gentlemen would find it difficult to bear all their expenses with five dollars a day; but the compensation could not be on a principle of discrimination, and therefore the House could not make particular provision for such gentlemen. Others might think a less sum sufficient, but no discrimination could here take place; it was therefore necessary to accommodate, and upon this principle he hoped the House would agree to five dollars per day; nor would this be any variation from the principle established by the committee who reported the bill. They had taken the pay of the delegates to the late Congress, and struck an average, which was found to be about five dollars and a half; they had reported six, but from the principles he had before mentioned, he thought it better to agree to five.

Mr. GERRY.—The gentleman from Jersey, who was last up, says he does not think six dollars per day more than sufficient; but that he will, from a principle of delicacy, vote for five. I am as great a friend to delicacy as any man, but I would not sacrifice essentials to a false delicacy. It seems, from such sentiments, as if we were afraid to administer a Constitution which we are bound to administer. How are those sentiments reconcilable to the oath we have taken? The Constitution requires that we shall, by law, compensate the services of the members of both Houses.

It has been said, that money is now more valuable than it was a few years since. I admit the fact, sir, but four dollars per day was better under the old plan of Government than six or eight under this, because a delegate was then engaged for the whole year, but now he is to attend at intervals. Some members were continued several years successively, and consequently found it more advantageous. But this mode of reasoning is fallacious; the question ought to be determined upon its own merits. But if gentlemen are for sacrificing justice and propriety to delicacy, or any other motive, let them come forward and agree to what I mentioned before; let them strike out all that relates to their own compensation; they are called upon by their own arguments to do this.

Mr. SPENCER did not rise to speak to the question, but merely to reply to some observations that have fallen from the gentlemen who opposed the present motion, particularly his colleague. The want of candor and liberality might render gentlemen unpleasant in their situation; but the consequences arising from such causes, were often still more unpleasant. His colleague had insinuated, in a pointed manner, that the gentlemen who were in favor of the reduction, were actuated by motives not only improper and unworthy of a man of character, but such as appear base to his mind. It was said, that those who opposed this reduction, did it merely to court popularity. Whether the gentleman, his colleague, who brought forward the motion to-day, sacrificed more at that shrine than his colleague who had opposed it, he left to those to determine who noticed their conduct; but he believed they could never be charged with such meanness. For his own part, if he had sacrificed in this way, as his conduct had always been consistent with his sentiments, it must have been known, and his character would long ere this have been blasted in the manner it would have justly deserved. If he had done it heretofore, he hoped the stigma would not be affixed upon him, for a conduct founded upon the solid and substantial reasons he had advanced when the subject was last before the House.

Mr. BOURNOR.—The gentleman from Massachusetts makes me say, that six dollars a day is not too much. I said it was not extravagant, but more than I thought was proper, upon due consideration of the circumstances of this country. This is still my opinion, and upon it I shall ground my vote. I believe no gentleman in this House regards his popularity, when set in competition with his duty; my conduct has ever been open, and I leave the world to judge from that what are my principles. I shall, therefore, take no further notice of what has been said on that subject, but conclude with wishing, for the honor of the House, and the dignity of the gentlemen, that all our debates may be conducted with candor and moderation.

Mr. AMES wished the call for the yeas and nays was withdrawn; because he thought they lost their usefulness by a too frequent use. He was in favor of the motion, but he did not wish to have his name entered upon the minutes on that account.

Mr. PARTRIDGE said, it was well known he never courted popularity; he never sought a seat in this House, or any other public body; but he insisted upon his right, as a member, to call for the yeas and nays, when he thought the public interest might be benefited by it; however, as the bill was not to be finished to-day, he would waive that call.

The question was taken on Mr. GOODHUR's motion, and passed in the negative, by a large majority.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, August 7.

A petition of John White, late a commissioner for settling the accounts between the United States and the States of Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland, was presented to the House and read, praying that he may receive compensation for his services in that character, which, from public considerations, he was induced to render beyond the time limited by an ordinance of the late Congress.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Messrs. SENEX, VINING, and HEISTER, that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same with their opinion thereupon to the House.

On motion. Ordered, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill or bills, for the further encouragement of the commerce and navigation of the United States.

And a committee was appointed, consisting of Messrs. GERRY, TRUMBULL, and BURKE.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, by General Knox, who delivered therewith sundry statements and papers relating to the same:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

The business which has been under the consideration of Congress has been of so much importance, that I was unwilling to draw their attention from it to any other subject; but the disputes which exist between some of the United States and several powerful tribes of Indians, within the limits of the Union, and the hostilities which have, in several instances, been committed on the frontiers, seem to require the immediate interposition of the General Government.

I have, therefore, directed the several statements and papers which have been submitted to me on this subject, by General Knox, to be laid before you for your information.

While the measures of the Government ought to be calculated to protect its citizens from all injury and violence, a due regard should be extended to those Indian tribes whose happiness, in the course of events, so materially depends on the national justice and humanity of the United States.

If it should be the judgment of Congress that it would be most expedient to terminate all differences in the southern district, and to lay the foundation for future confidence, by an amicable treaty with the Indian tribes in that quarter, I think it proper to suggest the consideration of the expediency of instituting a temporary commission for that purpose, to consist of three persons, whose authority should expire with the occasion. How far such a measure, unassisted by force, would be competent to the establishment and preservation of peace and tranquility on the frontiers, is also a matter which merits your serious consideration. Along with this subject, I am induced to suggest another, with the national importance and necessity of which I am deeply impressed—I mean some uniform and effective system for the militia of the United States. It is unnecessary to offer arguments in recommendation of a measure on which the honor, safety, and well-being of our country so evidently and so essentially depend.

But it may not be amiss to observe, that I am particularly anxious it should receive as early attention as circumstances will admit; because it is now in our power to avail ourselves of the military knowledge disseminated throughout the several States, by means of the many well instructed officers and soldiers of the late army; a resource which is daily diminishing by deaths and other causes.

To suffer this peculiar advantage to pass away unimproved, would be to neglect an opportunity which will never again occur, unless unfortunately we should again be involved in a long and arduous war.

GEO. WASHINGTON.
New York, August 7, 1789.

On motion,
Ordered, That the said message, with the statement and papers accompanying the same, be committed to the consideration of a Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

A petition of David Greenleaf was presented to the House and read, praying that an exclusive privilege may be granted him, to construct and build mills within the United States, upon the principles of an invention which he has discovered for turning them by the help of a weight that is appended.

Ordered, That the said petition do lie on the table.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS.

The engrossed bill for allowing a compensation to the members of both Houses and their officers, was read a third time; when

Mr. SPOWICK begged permission to trouble the House once more on the subject. He entertained a real apprehension, that if the bill became a law in its present form, it would have an insidious influence on the reputation of Government, and therefore he was desirous of bringing it to a greater degree of conformity with the opinion of the people of the United States; and gentlemen, in order to remove every ground of jealousy, would, no doubt, admit that opinion ought to be respected, when it was properly declared.

In order to ascertain the opinion of the people of America as to what will be a proper compensation to their servants employed in administering the Constitution they had adopted, he was led to inquire what were the wages they gave to their officers in their respective States, and he found that they bore no proportion to what are contemplated in this bill. The Governor of New Hampshire served for two hundred or three hundred shillings per annum; the Governor of Massachusetts, eight hundred pounds; the Chief Justice of the same State, but three hundred and seventy-five pounds; and the other judges, three hundred and fifty pounds. With regard to their abilities and integrity, he believed they were of the first rank; at least, he never knew a want of the best characters to fill those offices for such compensations. What then was he to think of seven hundred and thirty dollars per annum being given to the door-keeper? What would the public think? Or will they be unable to draw an inference? If they are not, they will conceive we are running into a profusion of expense beyond their expectation, and such as they are unable to bear. For these reasons he wished the House would consent to recommit the bill. He did not insist upon going over the provision respecting the compensation to the members, but he wanted to correct the bill in some other respects.

Mr. LIVERMORE seconded the motion, and, as signed, as an additional reason, that a Constitutional question arose out of its present form. The officers of the House would be established by law, if their compensation was affixed in that way; now, how far the President would be entitled to appoint such officers, was not a point which was clear. He thought there was some ambiguity in the case, and wished to avoid it by striking out that part of the bill; indeed, he had thought it wrong to authorize this, as the House had done some time ago by their vote of instructions to the committee. He had never seen an instance where the pay of a door-keeper or messenger was provided for by law; they originally brought in their accounts, and were paid as a part of the contingent charges. He submitted if it would not be better to establish the inferior officers upon this footing.

Mr. PAGE said, the bill had gone through the usual forms; that more discussion had already taken place than was consistent with order. If gentlemen were to treat every subject in this circumlocutory manner, it would be true that five dollars a day would give more than six, for the session would be considerably drawn out. He was no enemy to debate, but it ought to take place at a proper time. The bill was now engrossed, and gentlemen ought to have come forward with their objections yesterday, if they had designed so strenuous an opposition, and not sacrifice any more of the time of the House, especially as the bill had been sanctioned by a numerous and respectable majority.

Mr. AMES understood the motion to go no further than to alter some parts of the bill which had not been before canvassed. He always submitted to a fair majority, and though he wished the pay of the members less, and was sure it would be a happy circumstance to the administration of the Government, yet he did not desire to reiterate the question on that point. He wished to tell his constituents that the House acted upon principle in making their allowances; but while the bill stood as it did, it would contradict every one which gentlemen had advocated. He would join in the recommitment, in order to make every part of the bill consistent.

Mr. BOURNOUT joined in the recommitment, observing that seven hundred and thirty dollars a year was not proportioned to the principle established. This is a large salary, but gentlemen do not argue that it is necessary, in order to command men of science and abilities; a less sum would procure the best abilities in this line that were to be obtained in the United States. Gentlemen ought to remember what they allowed a principal clerk in the department for settling the accounts between the United States and individual States, an office of very considerable importance, whether we regard the abilities to fill it, or the trust and responsibility of the officer. The present Treasurer of the Union receives one thousand two hundred and fifty dollars; the door-keeper of this House seven hundred and fifty dollars. Is there any comparison in the importance of the offices?

Mr. LEE was against reconsidering, because the House would consume more time in the discussion than the door-keeper's salary was worth; besides, the door-keeper has to pay laborers and assistants out of this money, which may take half of his allowance.

Mr. LIVERMORE promised, if gentlemen would suffer the bill to be recommitment, it should never draw a word more from him.

Mr. STONE thought there would be little objection to the amendment talked of; and if gentlemen would exercise a little good humor and patience, the time would not be long before the bill would get through, and the House would enter upon more important business.

The question being taken on the recommitment, it was agreed to, and the committee struck out the door-keeper's salary, and allowed him and his laborers three dollars per day during the session; after which they rose and reported the bill as amended; whereupon, the House having agreed to the same, it was ordered to be again engrossed.

SATURDAY, August 8.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they had agreed to the resolutions sent to them the 27th ultimo, establishing joint rules between the two Houses for the enrolment of the acts of Congress, and to regulate the mode of presenting addresses to the President.

The Message from the President, with the papers accompanying the same, received yesterday, was called for, when a desultory conversation arose respecting the propriety of shutting the gallery doors, inasmuch as it was probable the statements and papers referred to in the Message might contain matters requiring to be kept secret. After the question had been agitated some time, the gallery doors were shut.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and came to the following resolutions:

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee that an act ought to pass providing for the necessary expenses attending any negotiations or treaties which may be held with the Indian tribes, or attending the appointment of commissioners for those purposes.

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee that an act ought to pass providing a proper system of regulations for the militia of the United States.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the first resolution, and that Mr. CLYMER, Mr. AMES, and Mr. MOORE, do prepare and bring in the same.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the second resolution, and that Mr. SUMNER, Mr. HEISTER, and Mr. MATTHEWS, do prepare and bring in the same.

MONDAY, August 10.

The petition of John McPherson was presented to the House and read, praying that an exclusive privilege may be granted him for a term of years, to make and vend lightning rods upon an improved construction; also, conductors and umbrellas, upon a model which he has invented, making them certain preservatives from lightning.

Ordered, That the said petition do lie on the table.

The engrossed bill for allowing a compensation to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, and their officers, was read a third time; and on the question, Shall this bill pass? The yeas and nays were required by Mr. GOODHUE.

Mr. GILMAN seconded the motion.

Mr. PAOS wished, since gentlemen were determined on calling the yeas and nays, that they could be called on the clauses separately, because he was against that part which did not admit of a discrimination between the members of the Senate and of the House.

Mr. GENAY thought the bill defective, because it was not general, providing for the pay of all the officers of the Government at once.

Mr. STONE hoped that gentlemen would not vote against the bill for such reasons as they had assigned, after the great labor it had taken to get it through.

One-fifth of the members present demanding the yeas and nays, they were taken, and are,

Yeas—Messrs. Baldwin, Benson, Brown, Burke, Carroll, Clymer, Fitzsimons, Gale, Griffin, Hartley, Heister, Huntington, Lawrence, Lee, Madison, Matthews, Moore, Muhlenburg, Page, Scott, Seney, Smith, of Maryland, Smith, of South Carolina, Stone, Sturgis, Sumter, Trumbull, Tucker, Vining, and Wadsworth—30.

Nays—Messrs. Ames, Boudinot, Cadwalader, Floyd, Gerry, Gilman, Goodhue, Grout, Hathorn, Leonard, Livermore, Partridge, Van Rensselaer, Sedgwick, Sylvester, and Thatcher—16.

So the bill passed in the affirmative, and the Clerk was directed to deliver the same to the Senate.

The House proceeded to consider the message sent from the Senate on the 5th instant, insisting on so much of their eighth amendment to the bill entitled "An act to establish the Treasury Department," as was disagreed to by the House; whereupon,

Resolved, That a conference be desired with the Senate on the subject-matter of the said eighth amendment, and that Mr. MADISON, Mr. FITZSIMONS, and Mr. BOWDITCH, be appointed managers of the same, on the part of this House.

The following Message was received from the President of the United States, by General Knox, who delivered in the same, together with a statement of the troops in the service of the United States:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

I have directed a statement of the troops in the service of the United States to be laid before you for your information.

These troops were raised by virtue of the resolves of Congress of the 20th of October, 1786, and the 3d of October, 1787, in order to protect the frontiers from the depredations of the hostile Indians, to prevent all intrusions on the public lands, and to facilitate the surveying and selling of the same, for the purpose of reducing the public debt.

As these important objects continuing to require the aid of the troops, it is necessary that the establishment thereof should, in all respects, be conformed by law to the Constitution of the United States.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

New York, August 10, 1789.

Ordered, That the said Message, with the statement accompanying the same, do lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they agree to the proposed conference on the subject-matter of so much of their eighth amendment to the bill entitled "An act to establish the Treasury Department," as was disagreed to by this House, and have appointed managers of the said conference on their part.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee on the memorial of Andrew Elliott, which lay on the table; and the same being amended to read as follows:

"That the survey directed by Congress in their act of June the sixth, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight, be made and returned to the Secretary of the Treasury without delay; and that the President of the United States be requested to appoint a fit person to complete the same, who shall be allowed five dollars per day, whilst actually employed in the said service, with the expenses necessarily attending the execution thereof."

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said report.

Mr. CLYMER, from the committee appointed for the purpose, presented a bill providing for the expenses which may attend negotiations or treaties with the Indian tribes, and the appointment of commissioners for managing the same; which was received and read the first time.

Adjourned.

TUESDAY, August 11.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the committee appointed to confer with a committee of the Senate, to consider of and report when it will be convenient and proper that an adjournment of the present session of Congress should take place, made a report, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

INDIAN TREATIES.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill providing for the expenses of Indian treaties.

It was directed in the said bill that commissioners, not exceeding three, should be appointed and allowed compensation.

Mr. SEDGWICK moved to strike out that part of the clause restraining the number of commissioners to three. He thought it a dangerous doctrine to be established, that the House had any authority to interfere in the management of treaties. He believed the moment any branch of the Government undertook to claim the exercise of powers not delegated by the Constitution, that moment the people of America would have reason to be alarmed for their safety. If there was any authority given the House by the Constitution to determine any thing with regard to treaties, it had escaped his attention. He hoped the gentleman who favored this clause of the bill would point it out to him. If the power here assumed was not given by that instrument, he would ask gentlemen where they meant to stop. Will not the recognition of such a principle in practice, tend to determine that the powers of this branch extended to all cases incident to Legislative authority, notwithstanding the restrictive clauses of the magna charta? Those with respect to treaties may be construed to allude to treaties of commerce only; that, as they have the privilege of declaring war, they have a natural right to inquire into the principles and reasons upon which their declarations are founded. This, it may be supposed, cannot be exercised without having some connexion with the other branch of the Government in forming treaties. In this way, the House may usurp a power destructive of the balance of the three branches, and which the people never intended they should exercise.

From the words of the Constitution, he thought the President had a right to make all treaties whatever, under the check of the Senate. How far those treaties would be obligatory if they contravened an existing law, might be a matter of doubt. He knew the Executive authority in England possessed the power of destroying a legislative act by the terms of a treaty; but whether the President had a similar power was questioned by some gentlemen of great information; yet no one ever doubted but the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, could employ what and as many negotiators as he pleased. This being the fair inference from the Constitution, he hoped the House would strike out the words that were calculated to limit him in a case beyond the authority of the Legislature.

Mr. STONE agreed with the honorable gentleman, that it was proper for each branch to confine themselves to the administration of their respective powers. He hoped neither would attempt to go beyond the authority vested in them by the Constitution; nor would he have them relinquish any part, because one must rise as the other falls, and in either case it might subvert the Government. But he did not see how the Constitution was concerned in the present question. There was no doubt entertained that the President, with the Senate, might appoint the commissioners, and empower them to negotiate. They might have done all this without consulting the House; but there can be no doubt, on the other side, but the House have a right to give an opinion on the subject, either before or after the treaty is ratified. He saw no difficulty in the business; the present appeared to him to be a simple case. The President knows we are to grant him money to carry his good intentions into effect, and we may grant this money on what terms we judge proper. Now, in order to keep up a good understanding, he has suggested to us the consideration of the expediency of instituting a temporary commission for the purpose of treating with the Indians, to consist of three persons. Why, when he has offered them to our consideration, should we quibble about the expediency, and refuse to insert it, without a single reason being adduced to show its impropriety?

Indian Treaties.

Mr. PAGE admitted, that the President and Senate were the proper bodies to make treaties, but the House had a right to say what money should be expended in this way. They had a right to say whether they would grant any or not; otherwise the President and Senate might do as they pleased with respect to negotiations, and call upon the House in all cases to defray their expense.

He remarked, that the clause in the Constitution gave the President, provided two-thirds of the Senate agreed, the power of making treaties, but it did not say all treaties. He therefore hoped the House would reserve the power of declaring what treaties were necessary, by making provision accordingly.

Mr. TUCKER thought the words of the Constitution not so extensive as they appeared to some gentlemen to be, and he drew this opinion from that part which authorized the President and Senate to appoint officers. This power was unquestionably vested in them by the Constitution; but it was inactive unless the officers were first established by law. Now, from this view of the circumstance, he inferred that the Legislature had the power of establishing the office of commissioners, and determining the number.

I have full confidence, said he, in the President; he has given us such an example of moderation, as ought to remove every apprehension of an improper exercise of any power whatsoever. I have good reason to believe, that the Senate are as careful in guarding and securing the general welfare as we are.

These circumstances are very flattering and agreeable, but they will not induce me to give up any part of the Constitutional powers of this House. I am sorry that the phraseology of our vote of Saturday on this subject, seems to countenance such an idea. I wish an alteration had taken place; and I am still persuaded, that unless it is contradicted, it will have an unhappy effect upon the administration of the Government. We are called upon by the Message from the President, to consider whether it will be most expedient to terminate all differences in the Southern district, by an amicable treaty with the Indian tribes in that quarter, and to consider of the expediency of instituting a Board of Commissioners for that purpose. What then have we to do with providing money until the first point is determined?

No doubt but the President and Senate have the authority to appoint ambassadors, or other public ministers; but they will certainly not appoint an officer without a legal establishment of the office. I conceive it to be indispensably necessary, that the Legislature should institute the office before the Executive power proceeds to making the appointment, otherwise the President and Senate might create, as well as fill offices, and thereby run the Union to such expenses as would be inconvenient, if not ruinous.

I am further of opinion, that, by heaping up power on the President, and striking out business for him daily, we shall so embarrass him, as to render him unable to execute his Constitutional duties. Suppose the Senate should in like manner surrender up their powers; what is to become of the Government?

Another consideration presents itself to my mind. If these commissioners are not instituted by law, they may perhaps be considered as a part of the power necessary to make treaties; in which case two-thirds of the Senate will be as necessary to their appointment as to any other part of the business, because the Constitution gives the President the power of making treaties, by and with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate; but if we say, as the President has requested, that there shall be three commissioners appointed to treat with the Indians, he will be able to make the appointment with the consent of a majority of the Senate; consequently the business may be conducted with greater facility.

I know it may be observed, that the President has exercised the right without its being disputed. The appointment of Mr. Short, as chargé des affaires in the absence of Mr. Jefferson, our minister at the court of Versailles, may be supposed to be of a like nature; but I do not view this transaction in the same point of light. The Executive in this case did not create the office, for the time of Mr. Jefferson's appointment had not expired; the minister only solicited leave of absence, and it is a Constitutional power in the President to fill up offices during the recess of the Senate; so that the case does not apply.

In short, the ground of the present business is the Message of the President; by it, we are not called upon to consider of the expediency of instituting a Board of Commissioners to treat with the Indians; we are not required to provide money; consequently we ought to confine ourselves to such inquiry, and if we deem it expedient, we ought to concur with him.

Mr. SMITH said, that the gentleman's argument did not apply, because it was not contended but by the Constitution, the President and Senate had power to form treaties with foreign nations. Now, if they have this power, it lies with them to carry it into effect in what manner they shall deem meet; it is not a subject of Legislative inquiry, whether it is done by persons sent into the country, or by a correspondence with a foreign Court; the right is still the same, and we are not to make the election.

He would ask those gentlemen, what was to be done, supposing the States were at war with a nation from whom overtures of peace were received? Suppose it was absolutely necessary during the next recess of Congress to send a minister, or an envoy, to the Dey of Algiers; would it be proper to delay so necessary a business, until this House could be convened? They would hardly be so regardless of the public interest as to require it, especially if the Constitution had not made it absolutely necessary.

The honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. PAGE) endeavored to draw a distinction, which cannot be warranted on any pretence whatsoever; a distinction between treaties of commerce and treaties of peace, that the President and Senate might form the one and not the other.

Mr. PAGE said, that he conceived the House had a concurrent jurisdiction in the formation of treaties, by the exercise of their Constitutional powers, necessary to give them efficacy.

Mr. SMITH would be glad if the honorable gentleman would point out the part of the Constitution that shows we have any such power. I believe it cannot be shown, nor was it ever contemplated by any person, that the Legislature had such a control. I know it has been debated in some of the State conventions, whether it is proper to let the President and Senate have this power. Some have thought the President ought to have it exclusively, others have judged it most eligible that the Senate is associated with him; but I never heard that any one thought the Legislature should have concurrent jurisdiction with them. It is admitted by all republicans, as an essential principle in a free Government, that the Executive and Legislative powers should be kept distinct; how then it could be blended in the formation of treaties, so as to produce sufficient good to counterbalance the evil, I am at a loss to conceive. There is good ground for complaint in having the Senate connected with the President in the performance of this duty; but the evil would be increased by giving this House any control in the business.

If the House can limit the President to three commissioners, and more may be found necessary, then the President cannot appoint them without infringing the powers of the House; by this means, the object in contemplation may be defeated, and we have committed a waste of our time and the public treasure.

Mr. SUMNER.—I apprehend that the debate would be very much shortened, if it turned upon the principal point that we ought to consider. If we had estimates before us, and were able to determine the sum necessary to carry into execution the object which the President has in contemplation, we might so confine the power of the Executive, as to leave us wholly free from any apprehensions of a possible impropriety in his conduct. If the sum was so limited as to enable him barely to defray the expense of a treaty, conducted by three commissioners, there could be no danger in the precedent. I think it perfectly parliamentary that the supply should be first voted, and it would certainly tend to remove the embarrassments under which we now labor.

As to what has been said, with respect to the power of the President making treaties of peace and commerce, I have only to observe that the present case involves both; but I think we ought to confine ourselves at present merely to provide the sums necessary to enable the commissioners to conclude a treaty with the Creek Indians; for I believe that they are the only nation with which the State of Georgia is at war. If gentlemen will confine themselves to this point, and we have the proper estimate before us, we shall be able to make more progress in the business.

Mr. BALDWIN did not consider the temporary institution of three commissioners to be any thing like the establishment of an office. If the President had contemplated it in that light, it is probable that he would have thought proper to have created Superintendents for Indian Affairs; he did not conceive the present object was the establishment of a system for conducting the Indian Department, but a mere temporary expedient, from which might be gained sufficient information to make a better future arrangement; and this he inferred from the manner in which the subject was introduced, by the Message from the President.

Mr. GERRY said, that his opinion conformed with that of the gentleman last up; he was very well satisfied, that the President did not want the Legislature to form a system for carrying on Indian treaties, which were always a source, in the manner they were usually conducted, of a perpetual warfare.

He did not know what occasion there was for striking out the number of commissioners from the clause, when the President had requested that that number only might be appointed.

Mr. JACKSON felt himself not much concerned with respect to the question of striking out, because it was a matter of indifference, whether Congress made a general or particular regulation for carrying into effect the good intentions of the President. But he wished to be indulged in bringing forward a clause, that should point out the intentions of Congress. He had mentioned this subject to the committee on Saturday last, and he conceived it now to be his indispensable duty to step forth, and call for and demand that protection and support which the Union is compelled, by the articles of the Constitution, to give to a sister State, who is unjustly injured by a neighboring foe. He thought the step recommended in the bill to be taken would be ineffectual, unless it was supported by the arm of the United States. The President, in his message, had submitted this very point, in some degree, for the serious consideration of the House; consequently there could be no impropriety in introducing it into the present bill.

The deplorable situation of the defenceless and plundered inhabitants of the State of Georgia, requires the exertion of the federal powers; and the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution obliges us, as we value the preservation of the public faith, to step forward in their behalf. The United States are to protect each other against invasion. If an invasion was only apprehended, the General Government are bound to exert themselves to ward off the blow; but we call not for those exertions on mere surmise. Georgia has been invaded; the fact is absolute and notorious. She has attempted to treat with her invaders. Three States have appointed commissioners with powers to meet and accommodate their differences. One of those commissioners is now upon this floor. Those commissioners, desirous of removing the distress of the inhabitants of the frontier, sent a friendly talk to the chief of the Creek nation; they requested to know of him when it would be convenient and agreeable for him to attend a meeting for the purpose of restoring peace and security to both nations.

Mr. M'GILLVARY did not deign to answer them, and neglected to meet them. The State commissioners were treated with contempt, though he condescended to write to private individuals; but in those letters he endeavored to hold up the State of Georgia in a ridiculous point of light. He threatened that if she was left to herself, he could soon bring her to reason.

This same man, this half-breed chief, has dared to treat even the United States with indignity! Notwithstanding he knew that, by the Constitution, the cause of an invaded State was the cause of the Union, he has had the temerity to attack the defenceless inhabitants, and committed depredations beyond any thing heretofore known; he has ravaged the country, spreading devastation around him. He has not confined himself to plundering the citizens of Georgia of their property; he has burnt up their dwellings, and torn up settlements by the roots; he has murdered the offspring before the mother's face, while the heart-broken matron has only been permitted to survive the horrid scene, for the sake of gratifying their more than infernal malice. Here I may be asked, what had Georgia done to rouse this malignant spirit? Georgia has done nothing but what she can fully justify. But this is not a question for our present inquiry; our business is to stop the progress of so alarming an evil. Georgia has not shown a disposition to embroil the Union. She declined raising that force which would have brought M'Gillvary to reason, out of deference to her sister States. She knew that to this honorable and respectable body belonged the right of declaring war, and of applying force. She looked forward with eagerness to that period, when the arm of the Union would be raised in her defence. She knew she was entitled to this assistance, in virtue of the most solemn compact. She bore with resignation the disappointments she met with, in her applications on this head, to the former Congress. With patience she waited for justice from those with whom her valiant bands had been leagued; with whom she had fought and conquered in the cause of liberty and safety; but that patience has been nearly exhausted. Think of men worn down with fatigue, harassed with perpetual exertions, their little all wasted and destroyed, and themselves banished from that country where their fathers were born and bred! These things, Mr. Chairman, are melancholy facts. The citizens of near half our lower country are exiled. Last Summer they did infinite mischief, and, by the last reports, we learn there were three thousand Indians in arms, ready to bear down upon that territory, and to destroy the remainder. They are only restrained by the circumstance of our sitting, and apprehending they will be punished for such violence. If nothing is now done, what are we to expect from that quarter?

I call upon the justice of this House; where else are the Georgians to look for redress? Shall they look to foreigners for support and protection? The very idea of such a measure ought not to be contemplated; yet the truth is irrepressible, and I must tell you, sir, they must procure protection here or elsewhere. In full confidence that a good, complete, and efficient Government would succor and relieve them, they were led to an early and unanimous adoption of the Constitution under which we deliberate. Obedience and protection are reciprocal. Will the wisdom of the House, then, teach them to withhold such just and well-grounded expectations. I trust not. They will see the importance of the object too clearly to neglect it. But, sir, we do little else than neglect it, when we talk of restoring them to peace and security by sending up commissioners. Paper negotiations they are taught to despise; nothing but an armed force can restrain them. The strength of the Union may keep them in awe; but Congress must show a disposition to exert it, before they will listen to terms of accommodation. M'Gillvary will be soon acquainted with our determination, and, according to its nature, he will regulate his conduct. This chief has his emissaries in Georgia and the Carolinas; he may have them, for aught I know, in this very city. If he learns that there is a timid disposition in this body; that they are supine and unwilling to make an exertion, which he cannot but dread, then will he be encouraged to return with his barbarians, to the total ruin of the State. Let us, then, prevent him; let our humanity, let our sacred faith, lead us to pursue such measures as will save a sister State from the future horrors of an Indian war. I am not against sending up commissioners, but let them present to him for his choice, the sword, or the olive branch; if he declines to receive the latter, let him be assured he will feel the keen edge of the former, and perhaps his prudence may induce him to treat on better terms.

With this view, Mr. JACKSON proposed to add a clause to the bill, to the following effect: That in case of the refusal of the Creek Indians to treat, or on treaty to agree to such articles and terms as to the commissioners to be appointed shall appear necessary and just, the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to raise, or cause to be raised, such number of troops, on the pay and establishment of the United States, or to call forth and embody such proportion of the militia of the States of South Carolina and Georgia, as will secure and protect, by such proper posts as he may think necessary, the inhabitants of the State of Georgia from the invasion and further inroads of the Creek Indians: Provided, the whole number of men so to be raised on the establishment of the United States shall not exceed — nor be continued for a longer term than —: And provided, also, that the whole body of the militia so to be called forth and embodied, shall not exceed — nor shall any one person be obliged to serve more than —. And the said militia, when in actual service, shall be entitled to the pay and emoluments of the troops of the United States."

The question was taken on striking out the words, "that commissioners, not exceeding three, and it passed in the affirmative.

Mr. FRIZZMONS thought the motion made by the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. JACKSON,) had better lie over until to-morrow, and then, if the idea was adopted by the House, it could become the foundation of a separate bill, as it appeared to be a distinct subject. He conceived the business would be more expedited in this way than any other; he would therefore move the committee to rise.

Mr. PAGE hoped the committee would not rise before they adopted the clause. In his opinion it was the most important part of the whole, and he feared, unless it was added, that the whole expense of holding the treaty would be thrown away.

Mr. SUMNER did not rise to oppose the clause, but he wished it might lie over till to-morrow. He confessed there were some words in it that did not meet his approbation. Though he was willing to go as far as any gentleman to restore tranquillity to the State of Georgia, yet he should be sorry to have it thought that it was impossible to conclude a treaty with the Indians, without enforcing it by employing a large armed force to go up into the country.

Mr. MANISON.—I concur with the gentleman from Georgia, that protection is clearly due by the Union to every State which is found to pay obedience to its authority; but I would submit to his consideration, whether it would not be better to let the bill pass as it now is, in consequence of which the President could early set on foot the proper measures for attempting their relief; while the object of his motion may be better connected with the subsequent Message received from the President relative to the troops already raised to protect the frontiers from the depredations of the hostile Indians. By the Constitution, the President has the power of employing these troops in the protection of those parts which he thinks requires them most. Besides this circumstance, there is a committee already appointed to bring in a bill for regulating the militia, and this anticipates the latter part of the motion, or at least it can have no effect until the militia are defined and arranged.

I am inclined to think that some measures like those proposed may be very proper; but I do not conceive that they ought to be incorporated into the present bill; nor can it be proper to give an indefinite power to the Executive to raise troops. Mr. JACKSON said it would have a good effect if the clause could be introduced into this bill, because the whole subject would be viewed together; but he was willing to amend it in such a manner as to remove the gentleman's objections. A desultory conversation arose, and some alterations of the clause were proposed; when at length Mr. JACKSON withdrew it, in order to correct it and bring it before the House.

The committee then rose and reported, that they had, according to order, had the said bill under consideration, and gone through the same, and made amendments thereto; the bill with amendments being twice read, were agreed to by the House, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed.

On motion, it was ordered, that the Message from the President of the United States, by General Knox, of the 10th instant, with the statement accompanying the same, be referred to the consideration of a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The motion proposed by Mr. JACKSON in the committee, as an amendment to the bill providing for the expenses attending the negotiations with the Indians, was also referred to the same committee; after which, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, August 12.

INDIAN TREATIES.

The engrossed bill providing for the expenses which may attend negotiations for treaties with the Indian tribes, and the appointment of commissioners for managing the same, was read the third time; when it was moved to fill the first blank therein with 41,000 dollars.

Mr. SUMNER observed, that they had no data to govern them in making the provisions; consequently, gentlemen were to judge from their own opinions what would be a proper sum. He thought that proposed was much beyond what there was occasion for. If he were to mention a sum, he would name 16,000 dollars as sufficient to complete the business, because he did not conceive it absolutely necessary to purchase a treaty. The Creek Indians, notwithstanding their depredations, he believed were willing to treat upon more honorable and equal terms. He had been informed, that they were disposed to an accommodation, and he hoped it might be brought about without so heavy an expense. He believed they were inclined to preserve the peace of their neighbors.

Mr. JACKSON would be as careful of the public money as any gentleman within these walls, but he did not conceive 41,000 dollars too much. The honorable gentleman from South Carolina should recollect, that the bill was not limited to a particular treaty; it made a general provision for negotiating with the Indians on the frontiers, and within the limits of the Union; consequently it might be applied to quiet the disturbances of the Northern as well as the Southern Indians.

The honorable gentleman has heard that the Creeks are desirous of peace. No doubt he has had such information; but I never understood they had a wish of the kind. On the contrary, I know that our country has been for a long time past, and is still, exposed to all the horrors of a savage and brutal war. This is not private information, but the official communication from the Secretary at War. Mr. GILLVARY, in his letters to individuals, has said, "leave the Georgians to their fate, and he will teach them reason." Are these indications of a peaceful disposition? Are these signs of an approaching treaty? Can it be supposed that a half-breed savage has more humanity than the civilized citizens of Georgia?

It may be easy for men who, with their families, are secure from being plundered and butchered, whose wives and daughters are not exposed to the brutal ravisher, to reason upon and contemplate distant evils with a stoical indifference; they see through a medium that deceives and warms over the most horrid distortion of human nature. Were they, like me, acquainted with the desolation of my country, the wretchedness of my fellow-citizens, or worse than murder, of their dearest relatives, they would feel, and their arms would hurl vengeance like vivid lightning upon the cause of such misfortunes. Could they see the distressed and disconsolate mother, sitting amidst the ruin of her fortunes, with her children torn from her bosom, her daughters led into captivity by barbarians, who regard not law human or divine—could they, in a word, have seen (but the thought almost unmans me) Mrs. M'CORMICK, a worthy and venerable matron, lamenting over a daughter compelled to submit to the lustful embrace of an Indian, they would be roused with indignation, and think the public money well bestowed in revenging or preventing such disorders.

He concluded with begging pardon of the House if he had been hurried away too far, and insinuated any thing to hurt the feelings of any man; but really he was so possessed with the subject, that he could hardly restrain himself to the bounds which he had prescribed to himself on every occasion; but he was too well convinced of the candor and judgment of the House, to doubt their doing justice to his country.

Mr. SUMNER said, that he was convinced nothing could drop from the honorable gentleman last up that would give offence, but what he would atone for as soon as he was sensible of it; but he thought the gentleman had suffered himself to be too much affected by the situation of his country to apply his arguments to the reason of his hearers. On this occasion he had certainly addressed the passions more than the judgment. He believed what the gentleman had mentioned were generally facts, but certainly those who knew the Indians and their manner of warfare, would allow that they seldom or never attempted the chastity of the female sex; he knew the tortments to which their unhappy prisoners were exposed, but this offence was not among the number.

As to the sum proposed to be inserted, it was certainly too great, because it was not in contemplation to treat with any other than the Creek Indians; the official communication on the table only alluded to them; but if the Wabash nation was included, it was certainly too much.

He had not been indifferent to the sufferings of Georgia, but he believed the disposition of the Indians to be friendly, because they had not taken the advantage they had in their power of extending their depredations. A body of 1300 of them had been within fifty miles of the capital, and nothing could have prevented them from laying it in ashes, if they had been so inclined. What saved the Georgians at that time but the humanity of their enemy?

Let Mr. GILLVARY know that he is not to be trifled with, and he will willingly treat; but if commissioners were sent without power to settle the point in difference, how can he be expected to listen? With respect to the commissioners sent on a former occasion, whom he declined to meet, the term of their appointment had expired, which he very well knew; and how can he be blamed for not noticing them more than other individuals, unless we are inclined to treat his judgment with contempt?

There can be no doubt but the supreme authority of the Union, clothed under the new Constitution with ample powers, will be attended to with deference; these are the sentiments of the chief himself, from which I infer that a treaty may be easily concluded with him. The facts already mentioned, prove that he is disposed for peace; where then is the necessity of running into the expense of purchasing a treaty?

Mr. JACKSON said, it was neither the courage of Mr. GILLVARY nor the cowardice of the Georgians that had occasioned their misfortunes; it was the defence they paid to the articles of confederation. They did not choose, by a breach of these, to draw upon themselves the resentment of the Union, otherwise they could have carried the war into the Indian country, and annihilated the Creek nation. He apprehended, when Georgia could raise 15,000 men, 6,000 of the Creek Indians were not sufficient to oppose them.

I am sorry that gentlemen should oppose a measure which I know to be essential to the peace and security of that State. Is it a time to talk of tranquillity and humanity, when 70 miles of our old settled country is laid waste, when we are invaded and overrun by a ferocious enemy? Do gentlemen mean that the State shall be destroyed, while they refuse to comply with the most sacred stipulations? The Union is to protect each State from invasion; Georgia is invaded, and requires that protection; she sacredly adheres to her part of the contract; she does nothing more than act on the defensive; she does not engage in war, though actually invaded, and in such imminent danger as will hardly admit of delay. Was it for this she adopted this Constitution? Where is the benefit of it to her? The honorable gentleman said I addressed the passions; where is the man, knowing and feeling as I do, but would be irritated? A man must be lost to every sentiment of patriotism, and buried in apathy, that can be insensible to his country's wrongs. Georgia cannot any longer remain inactive; if she receives no succor from this quarter, she must apply to some other—she must exert herself to oppose her invader, and there beats not a bosom but will be roused to vengeance. I declare this publicly: my arm shall be lifted on the occasion; we must, if too weak ourselves to accomplish the object, league with the arms of Spain or Britain. It is in vain to delay; it is vain to think paper or parchment will restore them to quiet; nothing but an exertion of force can be our remedy. We are told of the dangerous situation of the Western Territory; can this be compared to that of Georgia, when her citizens are driven to despair? I will not urge any thing further at present, but beg gentlemen to consider that the money they grant now, is intended as a general provision; 16,000 dollars might be sufficient perhaps for a single treaty, but 41,000 may be necessarily expended on so extensive an undertaking as holding treaties with all Indian nations between whom and the United States there is any dispute.

Mr. SUMNER was desirous of accommodating the difference between the Creek nation and Georgia, but he was not inclined to squander so large a sum as 41,000 dollars in a treaty, when he was well convinced, in his own mind, that half the sum would be sufficient, and to estimate was produced to show that a greater sum was requisite.

Mr. BALDWIN attributed the want of support to the weakness of the former Government, and not to any want of disposition in the Union to support every part thereof; for which reason he declined any comment upon the inattention which Congress had formerly shown on this subject. As to the sum of 41,000 dollars, he presumed it was necessary, because by an estimate which he had seen, and which was mentioned in the communication on the table, the treaty with the Creeks would cost 25,000 dollars, and another, which he understood might possibly be in contemplation with the Wabashes, would cost 16,000, making the whole sum moved for. Had the bill confined the subject of negotiation to the Creeks alone, as both he and his colleague wished, 41,000 dollars was certainly a large sum; but since it was determined to leave the subject open he conceived Congress would agree to make that grant.

Mr. CLYMER was willing to allow the whole sum, and was satisfied such part of it as was expended would be done in a satisfactory manner, and the residue would be reserved in the Treasury.

Mr. FITZSIMONS was sorry to differ on this subject with his worthy colleague, but he could not consent to risk the public money without knowing for what. If 41,000 dollars were necessary to the accomplishment of the present object, he should not hesitate to vote for that sum; but before he could agree to it, he must see an estimate of the expense, on which to found his judgment. As the honorable gentleman from Georgia had referred to letters on the table for information on this point, he wished to have the papers accompanying the Message read.

The communications being read, Mr. BURKS proceeded to remark, that the State of South Carolina had not been an indifferent spectator of the calamities of her sister and neighboring State, but she was prevented, by the confederation and local circumstances, from making those exertions in her support which she was disposed to make. He was of opinion, if Congress did not think it absolutely necessary to send troops up into that country, they would act wisely to stand ready to embrace any advantages arising from the present measure. He hoped the bill would not be defeated by an ill-timed parsimony; if a peace was brought about for 41,000 dollars, it would eventually be a great saving to the Union.

Mr. JACKSON read some letters from that country, by which it appeared that McGillvary was far from being disposed for peace; from which he enforced again the necessity of sending out troops, and embodying the militia.

Mr. HARTLEY thought the difficulty on the present occasion arose from the want of having some rule to decide upon. No estimate of the probable expense was brought forward, consequently gentlemen were embarrassed. It was no doubt well known on this floor, that the Creek Indians were the most numerous of any nation upon the frontiers. If then gentlemen admit that 16,000 dollars is no more than sufficient to defray the expense of negotiating with the Wabashes, they cannot hesitate to allow 25,000 dollars for the other. Nor is this all; the President in his Message contemplates other treaties besides the one with the Creeks, and this provision is to empower him generally to send commissioners into the Indian country, and conclude treaties for terminating all differences in that quarter.

Mr. MOORE did not doubt but whatever money was appropriated, would be used with economy; but he was decidedly against expending any sum in such way, because it was nothing more than holding out a bribe for the savages to commence hostilities whenever they should want presents from the United States; he hoped neither this nor any future Congress would ever allow a shilling to be appropriated to any such use.

Mr. BALDWIN produced an estimate of the probable expense of a treaty with the Creek Indians, from which it appeared that the treaty would cost the Union twenty-five thousand dollars.

The question of filling the blank with forty-one thousand dollars was now taken and lost, there being twenty-three for, and twenty-four against it.

Mr. MANISON was sorry the question was lost, because it was of importance that the business should be done; and he thought it would be best to err on the safe side. If forty-one thousand dollars had been granted, gentlemen might have rested assured that it would have been expended with economy. Besides, if nothing decisive was now done, it would be a loss of a year, on account of the approaching season.

He moved to fill the blank with forty thousand dollars, which was a round sum.

On this motion the yeas and nays were called by one-fifth of the members present, and are as follow:

YEAS—Messrs. Baldwin, Benson, Brown, Burke, Cadwalader, Clymer, Coles, Fitzsimons, Gale, Griffin, Hartley, Huntington, Jackson, Lawrence, Lee, Madison, Matthews, Muhlenberg, Page, Scott, Smith, of South Carolina, Stone, Sylvester, Trumbull, Tucker, Vining, Wadsworth and Wynkoop—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Boudinot, Carroll, Floyd, Gerry, Gilman, Grout, Hathorn, Heister, Leonard, Livermore, Moore, Parker, Partridge, Van Rensselaer, Schureman, Sedgwick, Seney, Sherman, Smith, of Maryland, Sturgis, Sumter, and Thatcher—23.

So the motion was agreed to.

The bill was committed to the Committee of the Whole, on account of some imperfections, and after being corrected in the Committee of the Whole, the bill was again ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow; after which the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, August 13.

INDIAN TRIBES.

The engrossed bill for providing for the expenses which may attend negotiations with the Indian tribes, and the appointment of commissioners for managing the same, was read the third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. LEE moved that the House now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the committee of eleven, to whom it had been referred to take the subject of amendments to the Constitution of the United States generally into their consideration.

Mr. PAGE hoped the House would agree to the motion of his colleague without hesitation, because he conceived it essentially necessary to proceed and finish the business as speedily as possible; for whatever might be the fact with respect to the security which the citizens of America had for their rights and liberties under the new Constitution, yet unless they saw it in that light, they would be uneasy, not to say dissatisfied.

He thought, likewise, that the business would be expedited by the simplicity and self-evidence which the propositions reported possessed, as it was impossible that much debate could take place.

Mr. SEDGWICK was sorry that the motion was made, because he looked upon this as a very improper time to enter upon the consideration of a subject which would undoubtedly consume many days; and when they had so much other and more important business requiring immediate attention, he begged gentlemen to recollect that all they had hitherto done was of little or no effect; their impost and tonnage laws were but a dead letter.

Mr. MANISON did not think it was an improper time to proceed in this business; the House had already gone through with subjects of a less interesting nature; now if the Judiciary bill was of such vast importance, its consideration ought not to have been postponed for those purposes.

He would remind gentlemen that there were many who conceived amendments of some kind necessary and proper in themselves; while others who are not so well satisfied of the necessity and propriety, may think they are rendered expedient from some other consideration. Is it desirable to keep up a division among the people of the United States on a point in which they consider their most essential rights are concerned? If this is an object worthy the attention of such a numerous part of our constituents, why should we decline taking it into our consideration, and thereby promote that spirit of urbanity and unanimity which the Government itself stands in need of for its more full support?

Already has the subject been delayed much longer than could have been wished. If after having fixed a day for taking it into consideration, we should put it off again, a spirit of jealousy may be excited, and not allayed without great inconvenience.

Mr. Vining, impressed by the anxiety which the honorable gentleman from Virginia had discovered for having the subject of amendments considered, had agreed in his own mind to waive, for the present, the call he was well authorized to make, for the House to take into consideration the bill for establishing a Land Office for the disposal of the vacant lands in the Western Territory. In point of time, his motion had the priority; in point of importance, every candid mind would acknowledge its preference; and he conceived the House was bound to pay attention to it as early as possible; as they had given leave for a bill to be brought in, they ought not to neglect proceeding onwards with it.

Mr. SEDGWICK hoped the House would not consume their time in a lengthy discussion upon what business should be done first. He was of opinion that there were several matters before them of more importance than the present; and he believed the people abroad were neither anxious nor jealous about it; but if they were, they would be satisfied at the delay, when they were informed of the cause. He begged, therefore, that the question proposed by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. LEE) might be put without further debate.

Mr. SMITH said that the Judicial bill was entitled to the preference in point of order, and in point of propriety it deserved the first attention of the House. For his part, he could not conceive the necessity of going into any alterations of the Government until the Government itself was perfected. The Constitution establishes three branches to constitute a whole; the Legislative and Executive are now in existence, but the Judicial is uncreated. While we remain in this state, not a single part of the revenue system can operate; no branch of your laws can be punished; illicit trade cannot be prevented. Greater harm will arise from delaying the establishment of the Judicial system, than can possibly grow from a delay of the other subject. If gentlemen are willing to let it lie over to a period of greater leisure, I shall join them cheerfully and candidly, said he, in a full discussion of that business.

An honorable gentleman from Virginia observed to us that these propositions were self-evident, that little or no debate can grow out of them. That may be his opinion, but truly, sir, it is not mine; for I think some of them are not self-evident, and some of them will admit of lengthy discussion; and some others, I hope, may be rejected, while their place may be better supplied by others hereafter to be brought forward. Some members are pledged to support amendments, and will, no doubt, support them with all the arguments their fancy or ingenuity can suggest. Viewing it in this light, it is not to be expected that the discussion will be ended in less than a fortnight or three weeks; and let gentlemen consult their own feelings whether they have so much time now to spare.

Mr. HARTLEY thought the Judicial system ought to be finished before any other business was entered upon, and was willing to consider of amendments to the Constitution when the House was more disengaged; because he wished very much that the Constitution was so modified as to give satisfaction to honest and candid minds. Such would be satisfied with securing to themselves and their posterity all those blessings of freedom which they are now possessed of. As to the artful and designing, who had clamored against the whole work, he had not the smallest desire to gratify them: he hoped and trusted their numbers were but few.

Mr. GRANTY thought the discussion would take up more time than the House could now spare; he was, therefore, in favor of postponing the consideration of the subject, until the Judicial bill, and the bill for registering and clearing vessels, and some other bills relating to the revenue business, were gone through. He asked the gentleman from Virginia, if he conceived that the amendments in the report were all that were to be taken into consideration. He thought the community would be little more pleased with them than if they had omitted the subject altogether. Besides, it was absurd to suppose that the members were obliged to confine their deliberations solely to those objects, when it was very well known that the members from Massachusetts and is gone through, gentlemen's patience and application will be so harassed and fatigued as to oblige them to leave it in an unfinished state until the next session; besides, were the Judicial bill to pass now, it could not take effect until others were enacted, which probably at this time are not drawn up.

Mr. SMITH.—The honorable gentleman has concluded his remarks by assigning the best reason in the world why we should go into a consideration of the Judicial bill. He says, that even if it were now passed, it would take some time before it could get into operation; he must admit it to be an essential part of the Government, and, as such, ought not to remain a single instant in a state of torpidity.

Mr. FRIZZIMON wished gentlemen would suffer the question to be put, and not consume the time in arguing about what should be done. If a majority was not in favor of considering amendments, they might proceed to some other business.

Mr. PAGE was positive the people would never support the Government, unless their anxiety was removed. They, in some instances, adopted it, in confidence of its being speedily amended; they will complain of being deceived, unless their expectations are fulfilled. So much time has elapsed since the subject was first brought forward, said he, that people will not think us serious, unless we now set about and complete it.

He begged gentlemen to consider the importance of the number of citizens who were anxious for amendments; if these had been added to those who openly opposed the Constitution, it possibly might have met a different fate. Can the Government, under these circumstances, possess energy, as some gentlemen suppose? Is not the confidence of the people absolutely necessary to support it?

The question was now put, and carried in the affirmative.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. BOURNOR in the Chair, and took the amendments under consideration. The first article ran thus: "In the introductory paragraph of the Constitution, before the words 'We the people,' add 'Government being intended for the benefit of the people, and the rightful establishment thereof being derived from their authority alone.'"

Mr. SHERMAN.—I believe, Mr. Chairman, this is not the proper mode of amending the Constitution. We ought not to interweave our propositions into the work itself, because it will be destructive of the whole fabric. We might as well endeavor to mix brass, iron, and clay, as to incorporate such heterogeneous articles, the one contradictory to the other. Its absurdity will be discovered by comparing it with a law. Would any Legislature endeavor to introduce into a former act a subsequent amendment, and let them stand so connected? When an alteration is made in an act, it is done by way of supplement; the latter act always repealing the former in every specified case of difference.

Besides this, sir, it is questionable whether we have the right to propose amendments in this way. The Constitution is the act of the people, and ought to remain entire. But the amendments will be the act of the State Governments. Again, all the authority we possess is derived from that instrument; if we mean to destroy the whole, and establish a new Constitution, we remove the basis on which we mean to build. For these reasons, I will move to strike out that paragraph and substitute another.

The paragraph proposed was to the following effect:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the following articles be proposed as amendments to the Constitution, and when ratified by three-fourths of the State Legislatures, shall become valid to all intents and purposes, as part of the same.

Under this title, the amendments might come in nearly as stated in the report, only varying the phraseology so as to accommodate them to a supplementary form.

Mr. MADISON.—Form, sir, is always of less importance than the substance; but on this occasion I admit that form is of some consequence, and it will be well for the House to pursue that which, upon reflection, shall appear to be the most eligible. Now it appears to me, that there is a neatness and propriety in incorporating the amendments into the Constitution itself; in that case, the system will remain uniform and entire; it will certainly be more simple when the amendments are interwoven into those parts to which they naturally belong, than it will if they consist of separate and distinct parts. We shall then be able to determine its meaning without references or comparison; whereas, if they are supplementary, its meaning can only be ascertained by a comparison of the two instruments, which will be a very considerable embarrassment. It will be difficult to ascertain to what parts of the instrument the amendments particularly refer; they will create unfavorable comparisons; whereas, if they are placed upon the footing here proposed, they will stand upon as good foundation as the original work. Nor is it so uncommon a thing as gentlemen suppose; systematic men frequently take up the whole law, and, with its amendments and alterations, reduce it into one act. I am not, however, very solicitous about the form, provided the business is but well completed.

Mr. SMITH did not think the amendment proposed by the honorable gentleman from Connecticut was compatible with the Constitution, which declared, that the amendments recommended by Congress, and ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, should be part of this Constitution; in which case it would form one complete system; but according to the idea of the amendment, the instrument is to have five or six suits of improvements. Such a mode seems more calculated to embarrass the people than any thing else, while nothing in his opinion was a juster cause of complaint than the difficulties of knowing the law, arising from Legislative obscurities that might easily be avoided. He said, that it had certainly been the custom in several of the State Governments to amend their laws by way of supplement. But South Carolina had been an instance of the contrary practice, in revising the old code; instead of making acts in addition to acts, which is always attended with perplexity, she has incorporated them, and brought them forward as a complete system, repealing the old. This is what he understood was intended to be done by the committee; the present copy of the Constitution was to be done away, and a new one substituted in its stead.

Mr. TUCKER wished to know whether the deliberations of the committee were intended to be confined to the propositions on the table. If they were not, he should beg leave to be brought before them the amendments proposed by South Carolina. He considered himself as instructed to bring them forward, and he meant to perform his duty by an early and prompt obedience. He wished to have the sense of the House on this point, whether he was in order to bring them forward.

Mr. LIVERMORE was clearly of opinion, that whatever amendments were made to the Constitution, they ought to stand separate from the original instrument. We have no right, said he, to alter a clause any otherwise than by a new proposition. We have well-established precedents for such a mode of procedure in the practice of the British Parliament and the State Legislatures throughout America. I do not mean, however, to assert that there has been no instance of a repeal of the whole law on enacting another; but this has generally taken place on account of the complexity of the original, with its supplements. Were we a mere Legislative body, no doubt it might be warrantable in us to pursue a similar method; but it is questionable whether it is possible for us, consistent with the oath we have taken, to attempt a repeal of the Constitution of the United States, by making a new one to substitute in its place; the reason of this is grounded on a very simple consideration. It is by virtue of the present Constitution, I presume, that we attempt to make another; now, if we proceed to the repeal of this, I cannot see upon what authority we shall erect another; if we destroy the base, the superstructure falls of course. At some future day it may be asked upon what authority we proceeded to raise and appropriate public moneys. We suppose we do it in virtue of the present Constitution; but it may be doubted whether we have a right to exercise any of its authorities while it is suspended, as it will certainly be from the time that two-thirds of both Houses have agreed to submit it to the State Legislatures; so that, unless we mean to destroy the whole Constitution, we ought to be careful how we attempt to amend it in the way proposed by the committee. From hence, I presume it will be more prudent to adopt the mode proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut, than it will be to risk the destruction of the whole by proposing amendments in the manner recommended by the committee.

Amendments to the Constitution.

Mr. VINING disliked a supplementary form, and said it was a bad reason to urge the practice of former ages, when there was a more convenient method of doing the business at hand. He had seen an act entitled an act to amend a supplement to an act entitled an act for altering part of an act entitled an act for certain purposes therein mentioned. If gentlemen were disposed to run into such jargon in amending and altering the Constitution, he could not help it; but he trusted they would adopt a plainness and simplicity of style on this and every other occasion, which should be easily understood. If the mode proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut was adopted, the system would be distorted, and like a careless written letter, have more attached to it in a postscript than was contained in the original composition.

The Constitution being a great and important work, ought all to be brought into one view, and made as intelligible as possible.

Mr. CLYMER was of opinion, with the gentleman from Connecticut, that the amendments ought not to be incorporated in the body of the work, which he hoped would remain a monument to justify those who made it; by a comparison, the world would discover the perfection of the original, and the superfluity of the amendments. He made this distinction, because he did not conceive any of the amendments essential, but as they were solicited by his fellow-citizens, and for that reason they were acquiesced in by others; he therefore wished the motion for throwing them into a supplementary form might be carried.

Mr. STONE.—It is not a matter of much consequence, with respect to the preservation of the original instrument, whether the amendments are incorporated or made distinct; because the records will always show the original form in which it stood. But, in my opinion, we ought to mark its progress with truth in every step we take. If the amendments are incorporated in the body of the work, it will appear, unless we refer to the archives of Congress, that GEORGE WASHINGTON, and the other worthy characters who composed the convention, signed an instrument which they never had in contemplation. The one to which he affixed his signature purports to be adopted by the unanimous consent of the delegates from every State there assembled. Now if we incorporate these amendments, we must undoubtedly go further, and say that the Constitution so formed was defective, and had need of alteration; we therefore propose to repeal the old and substitute a new one in its place. From this consideration alone, I think we ought not to pursue the line of conduct drawn for us by the committee. This perhaps is not the last amendment the Constitution may receive; we ought therefore to be careful how we set a precedent which, in dangerous and turbulent times, may unhinge the whole.

With respect to the observations of the gentleman from South Carolina, I shall just remark, that we have no authority to repeal the whole Constitution. The words referred to in that instrument only authorize us to propose amendments to it, which, when properly ratified, are to become valid, as a part of the same; but these can never be construed to empower us to make a new Constitution.

For these reasons, I would wish our expressions might be so guarded, as to purport nothing but what they really have in view.

Mr. LIVERMORE.—The mode adopted by the committee might be very proper, provided Congress had the forming of a Constitution in contemplation; then they, or an individual member, might propose to strike out a clause and insert another, as is done with respect to article 3, section 2. But certainly no gentleman acquainted with legislative business would pretend to alter and amend, in this manner, a law already passed. He was convinced it could not be done properly in any other way than by the one proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. GRANT asked, if the mode could make any possible difference, provided the sanction was the same; or whether it would operate differently in any one instance? If it will not, we are disputing about form, and the question will turn on the expediency. Now one gentleman tells you, that he is so attached to this instrument, that he is unwilling to lose any part of it; therefore, to gratify him, we may throw it into a supplementary form. But let me ask, will not this as effectually destroy some parts, as if the correction had been made by way of incorporation? or will posterity have a more favorable opinion of the original, because it has been amended by distinct acts? For my part, I cannot see what advantage can accrue from adopting the motion of the honorable gentleman from Connecticut, unless it be to give every one the trouble of erasing out of his copy of the Constitution certain words and sentences, and inserting others. But, perhaps, in our great veneration for the original composition, we may go further, and pass an act to prohibit these interpolations, as it may injure the text.

All this, sir, I take to be trifling about matters of little consequence. The Constitution has undoubtedly provided that the amendments shall be incorporated, if I understand the import of the words "and shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of the Constitution." If it had said that the present form should be preserved, then it would be proper to propose the alterations by way of a supplement. One gentleman has said, we shall lose the names that are now annexed to the instrument. They are names, sir, I admit, of high respect; but I would ask that gentleman, if they would give validity to the Constitution, if it were not ratified by the several States? or if their names were struck out, whether it would be of less force than it is at present? If he answers these questions in the negative, I shall consider it of no consequence whether the names are appended to it or not. But it will be time enough to discuss this point, when a motion is made for striking them out.

If we proceed in the way proposed by the honorable gentleman from Connecticut, I presume the title of our first amendment will be, a supplement to the Constitution of the United States; the next a supplement to the supplement, and so on, until we have supplements annexed five times in five years, wrapping up the Constitution in a maze of perplexity; and as great an adept as that honorable gentleman is at finding out the truth, it will take him, I apprehend, a week or a fortnight's study to ascertain the true meaning of the Constitution.

Amendments to the Constitution.

It is said, if the amendments are incorporated, it will be a virtual repeal of the Constitution. I say the effect will be the same in a supplementary way; consequently the objection goes for nothing, or it goes against making any amendments whatever.

It is said that the present form of the amendments is contrary to the 5th article. I will not undertake to define the extent of the word amendment, as it stands in the fifth article; but I suppose if we proposed to change the division of the powers given to the three branches of the Government, and that proposition is accepted and ratified by three-fourths of the State Legislatures, it will become as valid, to all intents and purposes, as any part of the Constitution; but if it is the opinion of gentlemen that the original is to be kept sacred, amendments will be of no use, and had better be omitted; whereas, on the other hand, if they are to be received as equal in authority, we shall have five or six constitutions, perhaps differing in material points from each other, but all equally valid; so that they may require a man of science to determine what is or is not the Constitution. This will certainly be attended with great inconvenience, as the several States are bound not to make laws contradictory thereto, and all officers are sworn to support it, without knowing precisely what it is.

Mr. STONE asked the gentleman last up, how he meant to have the amendments incorporated? Was it intended to have the Constitution republished, and the alterations inserted in their proper places? He did not see how it was practicable to propose amendments, without making out a new Constitution, in the manner brought forward by the committee.

Mr. LAWRENCE could not conceive how gentlemen meant to engraft the amendments into the Constitution. The original one, executed by the convention at Philadelphia, was lodged in the archives of the late Congress; it was impossible for this House to take, and correct, and interpolate that, without making it speak a different language; this would be supposing several things which never were contemplated. But what would become of the acts of Congress? They will certainly be vitiated, unless they are provided for by an additional clause in the Constitution.

What shall we say with respect to the ratifications of the several States? They adopted the original Constitution, but they have not thereby enabled us to change the one form of Government for another. It is true, amendments were proposed by some of them; but it does not follow, of necessity, that we should alter the form of the original which they have ratified. Amendments in this way are only proper in legislative business, while the bill is on its passage, as was justly observed before.

Mr. BENSON said, that this question had been agitated in the select committee, and determined in favor of the form in which it was reported; he believed this decision was founded in a great degree upon the recommendation of the State conventions, which had proposed amendments in this very form. This pointed out the mode most agreeable to the people of America, and therefore the one most eligible for Congress to pursue; it will likewise be the most convenient way. Suppose the amendments ratified by the several States; Congress may order a number of copies to be printed, into which the alterations will be inserted, and the work stand perfect and entire.

I believe it never was contemplated by any gentleman to alter the original Constitution deposited in the archives of the Union, that will remain there with the names of those who formed it, while the Government has a being. But certainly there is convenience and propriety in completing the work in a way provided for in itself. The records of Congress and the several States will mark the progress of the business; and nothing will appear to be done but what is actually performed.

Mr. MANISON.—The gentleman last up has left me but one remark to add, and that is, if we adopt the amendment, we shall so far unshingle the business, as to occasion alterations in every article and clause of the report.

Mr. HARTLEY hoped the committee would not agree to the alteration, because it would perplex the business. He wished the propositions to be simple and entire, that the State Legislatures might decide without hesitation, and every man know what was the ground on which he rested his political welfare. Besides, the consequent changes which the motion would induce, were such as, he feared, would take up some days, if not weeks; and the time of the House was too precious to be squandered away in discussing mere matter of form.

Mr. PAGE was sorry to find the gentlemen stop at the preamble; he hoped they would proceed as soon as the obstruction was removed, and that would be when the motion was negatived.

He thought the best way to view this subject, was to look at the Constitution as a bill on its passage through the House, and to consider and amend its defects, article by article; for which reason he was for entering at once upon the main business. After that was gone through, it would be time enough to arrange the materials with which the House intended to form the preamble.

Mr. LIVERMORE insisted that neither this Legislature, nor all the Legislatures in America, were authorized to repeal a Constitution; and that must be an inevitable consequence of an attempt to amend it in a way proposed by the committee. He then submitted to gentlemen the propriety of the alteration.

As to the difficulty which had been supposed in understanding supplemental laws, he thought but little of it; he imagined there were things in the Constitution more difficult to comprehend than any thing he had yet seen in the amendments.

Mr. JACKSON.—I do not like to differ with gentlemen about form; but as so much has been said, I wish to give my opinion; it is this: that the original Constitution ought to remain inviolate, and not be patched up, from time to time, with various studs resembling Joseph's coat of many colors.

Some gentlemen talk of repealing the present Constitution and adopting an improved one. If we have this power, we may go on from year to year, making new ones; and in this way, we shall render the basis of the superstructure the most fluctuating thing imaginable, and the people will never know what the Constitution is. As for the alteration proposed by the committee, to prefix before "We the people," certain dogmas, I cannot agree to it; the words, as they now stand, speak as much as it is possible to speak; it is a practical recognition of the right of the people to ordain and establish Governments, and is more expressive than any other mere paper declaration.

But why will gentlemen contend for incorporating amendments into the Constitution? They say, that it is necessary for the people to have the whole before them in one view. Have they precedent for this assertion? Look at the Constitution of Great Britain; is that all contained in one instrument? It is well known that magna charta was extorted by the barons from King John some centuries ago. Has that been altered since by the incorporation of amendments? Or does it speak the same language now, as it did at the time it was obtained? Sir, it is not altered a tittle from its original form. Yet there have been many amendments and improvements in the Constitution of Great Britain since that period. In the subsequent reign of his son, the great charters were confirmed with some supplemental acts. Is the habeas corpus act, or the statute De Tollagio non concedendo incorporated in magna charta? And yet there is not an Englishman but would spill the last drop of his blood in their defence; it is these, with some other acts of Parliament and magna charta, that form the basis of English liberty. We have seen amendments to their Constitution during the present reign, by establishing the independence of the judges, who are hereafter to be appointed during good behaviour; formerly they were at the pleasure of the Crown. But was this done by striking out and inserting other words in the great charter? No, sir, the Constitution is composed of many distinct acts; but an Englishman would be ashamed to own that, on this account, he could not ascertain his own privileges or the authority of the Government.

The Constitution of the Union has been ratified and established by the people; let their act remain inviolable; if any thing we can do has a tendency to improve it, let it be done, but without mutilating and defacing the original.

Mr. SHERMAN.—If I had looked upon this question as a mere matter of form, I should not have brought it forward, or troubled the committee with such a lengthy discussion. But, sir, I contend that amendments made in the way proposed by the committee are void. No gentleman ever knew an addition and alteration introduced into an existing law, and that any part of such law was left in force; but if it was improved or altered by a supplemental act, the original retained all its validity and importance in every case where the two were not incompatible. But if these observations alone should be thought insufficient to support my motion, I would desire gentlemen to consider the authorities upon which the two Constitutions are to stand. The original was established by the people at large, by conventions chosen by them for the express purpose. The preamble to the Constitution declares the act; but will it be a truth in ratifying the next Constitution, which is to be done perhaps by the State Legislatures, and not conventions chosen for the purpose? Will gentlemen say it is "We the people" in this case? Certainly they cannot; for, by the present Constitution, we, nor all the Legislatures in the Union together, do not possess the power of repealing it. All that is granted us by the 5th article is, that whenever we shall think it necessary, we may propose amendments to the Constitution; not that we may propose to repeal the old, and substitute a new one.

Gentlemen say, it would be convenient to have it in one instrument, that people might see the whole at once; for my part, I view no difficulty on this point. The amendments reported are a declaration of rights; the people are secure in them, whether we declare them or not; the last amendment but one provides that the three branches of Government shall each exercise its own rights. This is well secured already; and, in short, I do not see that they lessen the force of any article in the Constitution; if so, there can be little more difficulty in comprehending them whether they are combined in one, or stand distinct instruments.

Mr. SMITH read extracts from the amendments proposed by several of the State conventions at the time they ratified the Constitution, from which, he said, it appeared that they were generally of opinion that the phraseology of the Constitution ought to be altered; nor would this mode of proceeding repeal any part of the Constitution but such as it touched, the remainder will be in force during the time of considering it and ever after.

As to the observations made by the honorable gentleman from Georgia, respecting the amendments made to the Constitution of Great Britain, they did not apply; the cases were nothing like similar, and consequently, could not be drawn into precedent. The Constitution of Britain is neither the magna charta of John, nor the habeas corpus act, nor all the charters put together; it is what the Parliament wills. It is true, there are rights granted to the subject that cannot be resumed; but the Constitution, or form of Government, may be altered by the authority of Parliament, whose power is absolute without control.

Mr. SENEY was afraid the House would consume more time than was at first apprehended in discussing the subject of amendments, if he was to infer any thing from what had now taken place. He hoped the question would soon be put and decided.

Mr. VINING was an enemy to unnecessary debate, but he conceived the question to be an important one, and was not displeased with the discussion that had taken place; he should, however, vote in favor of the most simple mode.

Mr. GERRY.—The honorable gentleman from Connecticut, if I understand him right, says that the words "We the people" cannot be retained, if Congress should propose amendments, and they be ratified by the State Legislatures. Now, if this is a fact, we ought most undoubtedly to adopt his motion; because if we do not, we cannot obtain any amendment whatever. But upon what ground does the gentleman's position stand? The Constitution of the United States was proposed by a convention met at Philadelphia; but, with all its importance, it did not possess as high authority as the President, Senate, and House of Representatives of the Union. For that convention was not convened in consequence of any express will of the people, but an implied one, through their members in the State Legislatures. The Constitution derived no authority from the first convention; it was concurred in by convention of the people, and that concurrence armed it with power and invested it with dignity. Now the Congress of the United States are expressly authorized by the sovereign and uncontrollable voice of the people, to propose amendments whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall think fit. Now, if this is the fact, the propositions of amendment will be found to originate with a higher authority than the original system. The conventions of the States, respectively, have agreed for the people, that the State Legislatures shall be authorized to decide upon these amendments in the manner of a convention. If these acts of the State Legislatures are not good, because they are not specifically instructed by their constituents, neither were the acts calling the first and subsequent conventions.

Does he mean to put amendments on this ground, that after they have been ratified by the State Legislatures, they are not to have the same authority as the original instrument? If this is his meaning, let him avow it; and if it is well founded, we may save ourselves the trouble of proceeding in the business. But, for my part, I have no doubt but a ratification of the amendments, in any form, would be as valid as any part of the Constitution. The Legislatures are elected by the people. I know no difference between them and conventions, unless it be that the former will generally be composed of men of higher characters than may be expected in conventions; and in this case, the ratification by the Legislatures would have the preference.

Now, if it is clear that the effect will be the same in either mode, will gentlemen hesitate to approve the most simple and clear? It will undoubtedly be more agreeable to have it all brought into one instrument, than have to refer to five or six different acts.

H. or R.]

Amendments to the Constitution.

Mr. SHERMAN.—The gentlemen who oppose the motion say we contend for matter of form; they think it nothing more. Now we say we contend for substance, and therefore cannot agree to amendments in this way. If they are so desirous of having the business completed, they had better sacrifice what they consider but a matter of indifference to gentlemen, to go more unanimously along with them in altering the Constitution.

The question on Mr. SHERMAN's motion was now put and lost.

Mr. LIVERMORE wished to know whether it was necessary, in order to carry a motion in committee, that two-thirds should agree.

Mr. HARTLEY mentioned, that in Pennsylvania, they had a council of censors who were authorized to call a convention to amend the Constitution when it was thought necessary, but two-thirds were required for that purpose. He had been a member of that body, when they had examined the business in a committee of council; the majority made a report, which was lost for want of two-thirds to carry it through the council.

Some desultory conversation took place on this subject, when it was decided by the chairman of the committee that a majority of the committee were sufficient to form a report.

An appeal being made from the opinion of the Chair, it was, after some observations, confirmed by the committee. After which the committee rose and reported progress.

Adjourned.

FRIDAY, August 14.

ABIEL FOSTER, from New Hampshire, appeared and took his seat.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the amendments to the Constitution, Mr. TRUMBULL in the Chair; when,

Mr. SMITH wished to transpose the words of the first amendment, as they did not satisfy his mind in the manner they stood.

Mr. GERRY said, they were not well expressed; we have it here "government being" intended for the benefit of the people; this holds up an idea that all the Governments of the earth are intended for the benefit of the people. Now, I am so far from being of this opinion, that I do not believe that one out of fifty is intended for any such purpose. I believe the establishment of most Governments is to gratify the ambition of an individual, who, by fraud, force, or accident, had made himself master of the people. If we contemplate the history of nations, ancient or modern, we shall find they originated either in fraud or force, or both. If this is demonstrable, how can we pretend to say that Governments are intended for the benefit of the people?

tended for the benefit of those who are most oppressed by them. This maxim does not appear to me to be strictly true in fact, therefore I think we ought not to insert it in the Constitution. I shall therefore propose to amend the clause, by inserting "of right;" then it will stand as it ought. I do not object to the principle, sir; it is a good one, but it does not generally hold in practice.

The question on inserting the words "of right" was put, and determined in the negative.

Mr. TUCKER.—I presume these propositions are brought forward under the idea of being amendments to the Constitution; but can this be esteemed an amendment of the Constitution? If I understand what is meant by the introductory paragraph, it is the preamble to the Constitution; it is, to say the best, a useless amendment. For my part, I should as soon think of amending the concluding part, consisting of General Washington's letter to the President of Congress, as the preamble; but if the principle is of importance, it may be introduced into a bill of rights.

Mr. SMITH read the amendments on this head, proposed by the conventions of New York, Virginia, and North Carolina, from which it appeared that these States had expressed a desire to have an amendment of this kind.

Mr. TUCKER replied that the words "We the people do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America," were a declaration of their action; this being performed, Congress have nothing to do with it. But if it was necessary to retain the principle, it might come in on some other place.

Mr. SUMNER thought this was not a proper place to introduce any general principle; perhaps, in going through with the amendments, something might be proposed subversive of what was there declared; wherefore he wished the committee would pass over the preamble until they had gone through all the amendments, and then, if alterations were necessary, they could be accommodated to what had taken place in the body of the Constitution.

Mr. LIVERMORE was not concerned about the preamble; he did not care what kind it was agreed to form in the committee; because when it got before the House, it would be undone if one member more than one-third of the whole opposed it.

Mr. PAGE thought the preamble no part of the Constitution; but if it was, it stood in no need of amendment; the words "We, the people," had the neatness and simplicity, while its expression was the most forcible of any he had ever seen prefixed to any Constitution. He did not doubt the truth of the proposition brought forward by the committee, but he doubted its necessity in this place.

Mr. MADISON.—If it be a truth, and so self-evident that it cannot be denied—if it be recognised, as is the fact in many of the State Constitutions—and if it be desired by three important States to be added to this—I think they must collectively offer a strong inducement to the mind desirous of promoting harmony to acquiesce with the report;

Amendments to the Constitution.

at least some strong arguments should be brought forward to show the reason why it is improper.

My worthy colleague says the original expression is neat and simple; that loading it with more words may destroy the beauty of the sentence; and others say it is unnecessary, as the paragraph is complete without it. Be it so in their opinion; yet still it appears important in the estimation of three States that this solemn truth should be inserted in the Constitution. For my part, sir, I do not think the association of ideas anywise unnatural; it reads very well in this place; so much so, that I think gentlemen, who admit it should come in somewhere else, will be puzzled to find a better place.

Mr. SHERMAN thought they ought not to come in in this place. The people of the United States have given their reasons for doing a certain act. Here we propose to come in and give them a right to do what they did on motives which appeared to them sufficient to warrant their determination; to let them know that they had a right to exercise a natural and inherent privilege, which they have asserted in a solemn ordinance and establishment of the Constitution.

Now, if this right is indefeasible, and the people have recognised it in practice, the truth is better asserted than it can be by any words whatever. The words "We the people," in the original Constitution, are as copious and expressive as possible; any addition will only drag out the sentence without illuminating it; for these reasons it may be hoped the committee will reject the proposed amendment.

The question on the first paragraph of the report was put and carried in the affirmative, twenty-seven to twenty-three.

The second paragraph in the report was read as follows:

Article 1. Section 2. Paragraph 3. Strike out all between the words "direct" and "and until such," and instead thereof insert "after the first enumeration, there shall be one representative for every thirty thousand, until the number shall amount to one hundred. After which the proportion shall be so regulated by Congress that the number of representatives shall never be less than one hundred, nor more than one hundred and seventy-five; but each State shall always have at least one representative."

Mr. VISING.—The duty, sir, which I owe to my constituents, and my desire to establish the Constitution on a policy dictated by justice and liberality, which will ever secure domestic tranquillity and promote the general welfare, induces me to come forward with a motion which I rest upon its own merits. Gentlemen who have a magnanimous policy in view, I trust, will give it their support, and concede to what is proper in itself, and likely to procure a greater degree of harmony. I therefore move you, sir, to insert after the words "one hundred and seventy-five" these words: "That where the number of inhabitants of any particular State amounts to forty-five thousand, they shall be entitled to two representatives."

This motion was negatived without a division. Mr. AMES moved to strike out "thirty thousand," and insert "forty thousand." I am induced to this, said he, because I think my fellow-citizens will be dissatisfied with too numerous a representation. The present, I believe, is in proportion to one for forty thousand, the number I move to insert. I believe we have hitherto experienced no difficulty on account of the smallness of our number; if we are embarrassed, I apprehend the embarrassment will arise from our want of knowing the general interest of the nation at large; or for want of local information. If the present number is found sufficient for the purpose of legislation, without any such embarrassment, it ought to be preferred, inasmuch as it is most adequate to its object.

But before we proceed in the discussion, let us consider the effect which a representation, founded on one member for thirty thousand citizens, will produce. In the first place, it will give four members for every three now entitled to a seat in this House, which will be an additional burden to the Union, in point of expense, in the same ratio. Add to this another consideration, that probably before the first census is taken, the number of inhabitants will be considerably increased from what it was when the convention which formed this Constitution obtained their information. This will probably increase the expenses of Government to four hundred and fifty thousand dollars annually. Now, those who have attended particularly to economy—who, upon the most careful calculation, find that our revenue is likely to fall infinitely short of our expenses—will consider this saving as a considerable object, and deserving their most serious regard.

It may become dissatisfactory to the people as an intolerable burden. Again, it must be abundantly clear to every gentleman, that, in proportion as you increase the number of representatives, the body degenerates; you diminish the individual usefulness; gentlemen will not make equal exertions to despatch business, when they can lean upon others for the arrangement.

By enlarging the representation we lessen the chance of selecting men of the greatest wisdom and abilities; because small district elections may be conducted by intrigue, but in large districts nothing but real dignity of character can secure an election. Gentlemen ought to consider how essential it is to the security and welfare of their constituents that this branch of the Government should support its independence and consequence.

Another effect of it will be an excitement or fermentation in the representative body. Numerous assemblies are supposed to be less under the guidance of reason than smaller ones; their deliberations are confused; they will fall the prey of party spirit; they will be unable to get through by fair and open argument. All these circumstances tend to retard the public business and increase the expense, making Government, in the eyes of some, so odious as to induce them to think it rather a curse than a blessing.

It lessens that responsibility which is annexed to the representative of a more numerous body of people; for I believe it will be found true that the representatives of forty thousand citizens will have more at risk than the man who represents a part of them. He has more dignity of character to support, and must use the most unremitting industry in their service to preserve it unsullied; he will be more sensible of the importance of his charge, and more indefatigable in his duty.

It is said that these amendments are introduced with a view to conciliate the affections of the people to the Government. I am persuaded the people are not anxious to have a large representation of one for every thirty thousand; they are satisfied with the representation they now enjoy. The great object which the convention of Massachusetts had in view, by proposing this amendment, was to obtain a security that Congress should never reduce the representation below what they conceived to be a point of security. Their object was not augmentation, it was certainty alone they wished for. At the next census, the number of representatives will be seventy or eighty, and in twenty years it will be equal to the desires of any gentleman. We shall have to guard against its growth in less than half a century. The number of proper characters to serve in the Legislature of any country is small; and of those many are inclined to pursue other objects. If the representation is greatly enlarged, men of inferior abilities will undoubtedly creep in; for although America has as great a proportion of men of sense and judgment as any nation on earth, yet she may not have sufficient to fill a legislative body unduly enlarged.

Now, if it has been questioned whether this country can remain united under a Government administered by men of the most consummate abilities, the sons of wisdom, and the friends of virtue, how much more doubtful will it be if the administration is thrown into different hands; and different hands must inevitably be employed, if the representation is too large.

Mr. MADISON.—I cannot concur in sentiment with the gentleman last up, that one representative for forty thousand inhabitants will conciliate the minds of those to the Government who are desirous of amendments; because they have rather wished for an increase, than confined themselves to a limitation.

I believe, by this motion, we shall avoid no inconvenience that can be considered of much consequence, for one member for either thirty thousand or forty thousand inhabitants, will, in a few years, give the number beyond which it is proposed Congress shall not go.

Now, if good policy requires that we accommodate the Constitution to the wishes of that part of the community who are anxious for amendments, we shall agree to something like what is proposed in the report, for the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New York, Virginia, and North Carolina, have desired an alteration on this head; some have required an increase as far as two hundred at least. This does not look as if certainty was their sole object.

I do not consider it necessary, on this occasion, to go into a lengthy discussion of the advantages of a less or greater representation. I agree that after going beyond a certain point, the number may become inconvenient; that is proposed to be guarded against; but it is necessary to go to a certain number, in order to secure the great objects of representation. Numerous bodies are undoubtedly liable to some objections, but they have their advantages also; if they are more exposed to passion and fermentation, they are less subject to venality and corruption; and in a Government like this, where the House of Representatives is connected with a smaller body, it might be good policy to guard them in a particular manner against such abuse.

But for what shall we sacrifice the wishes of the people? Not for a momentary advantage. Yet the amendments proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts will lose its efficacy after the second census. I think, with respect to futurity, it makes little or no difference; and as it regards the present time, thirty thousand is the most proper, because it is the number agreed upon in the original Constitution, and what is required by several States.

Mr. SENECA.—I observed, that the amendment proposed by the convention of Massachusetts was carried there, after a full discussion; since then, the whole of the amendments proposed by the convention had been recommended by the Legislature of that State to the attention of their delegates in Congress. From these two circumstances he was led to believe, that his and his colleague's constituents were generally in favor of the amendment as stated in the report.

He did not expect any advantage would arise from enlarging the number of representatives beyond a certain point; but he thought one hundred and seventy-five rather too few.

Mr. GERRY.—My colleague (Mr. AMES) has said, that we experience no inconvenience for want of either general or local knowledge. Sir, I may dispute the fact, from the difficulties we encountered in carrying through the collection bill, and on some other occasions, where we seemed much at a loss to know what are the dispositions of our constituents. But admitting this to be the fact, is information the only principle upon which we are to stand? Will that gentlemen pretend to say we have as much security in a few representatives as in many? Certainly he will not. Not that I would insist upon a burdensome representation, but upon an adequate one. He supposes the expenses of the Government will be increased in a very great proportion; but if he calculates with accuracy, he will find the difference of the pay of the additional members not to exceed a fourth. The civil list was stated to cost three hundred thousand dollars, but the House of Representatives does not cost more than a ninth of that sum; consequently, the additional members, at the ratio of four for three, could not amount to more than a thirtieth part, which would fall far short of what he seemed to apprehend. Is this such an object as to induce the people to risk every security which they ought to have in a more numerous representation?

One observation which I understood fell from him, was, that multiplying the number of representatives diminished the dignity and importance of the individuals who compose the House. Now I wish to know, whether he means that we should establish our own importance at the risk of the liberties of America; if so, it has been of little avail that we successfully opposed the lordly importance of a British Parliament. We shall now, I presume, be advised to keep the representation where it is, in order to secure our dignity; but I hope it will be ineffectual, and that gentlemen will be inclined to give up some part of their consequence to secure the rights of their constituents.

My honorable colleague has said, that large bodies are subject to fermentations; true, sir, but so are small ones also, when they are composed of aspiring and ambitious individuals. Large bodies in this country are likely to be composed, in a great measure, of gentlemen who represent the landed interest of the country; these are generally more temperate in debate than others, consequently, by increasing the representation we shall have less of this fermentation than on the present establishment. As to the other objections, they are not of sufficient weight to induce the House to refuse adopting an amendment recommended by so large a body of our constituents.

Mr. LIVERMORE was against the alteration, because he was certain his constituents were opposed to it. He never heard a single person but supposed that one member was little enough to represent the interest of thirty thousand inhabitants; many had thought the proposition ought to be one for twenty or twenty-five thousand. It would be useless to propose amendments which there was no probability of getting ratified, and he feared this would be the fate of the one under consideration, if the honorable gentleman's alteration took place.

Mr. AMES begged to know the reasons upon which amendments were founded. He hoped it was not purely to gratify an indigested opinion; but in every part where they retouched the edifice it was with an intention of improving the structure; they certainly could not think of making alterations for the worse. Now that his motion would be an improvement was clearly demonstrated from the advantage in favor of deliberating by a less numerous body, and various other reasons already mentioned; but to those, the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. MADISON) replied, by saying we ought to pay attention to the amendments recommended by the States. If this position is true, we have nothing more to do than read over their amendments, and propose them without exercising our judgment upon them. But he would undertake to say, that the object of the people was rather to procure certainty than increase; if so, it was the duty of Congress rather to carry the spirit of the amendment into operation than the letter of it.

The House of Representatives will furnish a better check upon the Senate, if filled with men of independent principles, integrity, and eminent abilities, than if consisting of a numerous body of inferior characters; in this opinion, said he, my colleague cannot but agree with me. Now if you diminish the consequence of the whole you diminish the consequence of each individual; it was in this view that he contended for the importance of the amendment.

He said it could not be the wish of Massachusetts to have the representation numerous, because they were convinced of its impropriety in their own Legislature, which might justly be supposed to require a greater number, as the objects of their deliberation extended to minute and local regulations. But that kind of information was not so much required in Congress, whose power embraced national objects alone. He contended, that all the local information necessary in this House, was to be found as fully among the ten members from Massachusetts, as if there had been one from every town in the State.

It is not necessary to increase the representation, in order to guard against corruption, because no one will presume to think that a body composed like this, and increased in a ratio of four to three, will be much less exposed to sale than we are. Nor is a greater number necessary to secure the rights and liberties of the people, for the representative of a great body of people is likely to be more watchful of its interests than the representative of a lesser body.

Mr. JACKSON.—I have always been afraid of letting this subject come before the House, for I was apprehensive that something would be offered striking at the very foundation of the Constitution, by lessening it in the good opinion of the people. I conceive that the proposition for increasing the ratio of representation will have this tendency; but I am not opposed to the motion only on the principle of expediency, but because I think it grounded on wrong principle. The honorable gentleman's arguments were as much in favor of intrusting the business of legislation to one, two, or three men, as to a body of sixty or a hundred, they would despatch business with greater facility and be an immense saving to the public; but will the people of America be gratified with giving the power of managing their concerns into the hands of one man? Can this take place upon the democratic principle of the Constitution, I mean the doctrine of representation? Can one man, however consummate his abilities, however unimpeachable his integrity, and however superior his wisdom, be supposed capable of understanding, combining, and managing interests so diversified as those of the people of America? It has been complained of, that the representation is too small at one for thirty thousand; we ought not therefore attempt to reduce it.

In a Republic, the laws should be founded upon the sense of the community; if every man's opinion could be obtained, it would be the better; it is only in aristocracies, where the few are supposed to understand the general interests of the community better than the many. I hope I shall never live to see that doctrine established in this country.

Mr. STONE supposed the United States to contain three millions of people; these, at one representative for every thirty thousand, would give a hundred members, of which fifty-one would be a quorum to do business; twenty-six men would be a majority, and give law to the United States, together with seven in the Senate. If this was not a number sufficiently small to administer the Government, he did not know what was. He was satisfied that gentlemen, upon mature reflection, would deem it inexpedient to reduce that number one-fourth.

Mr. SNEY said, it had been observed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, that it would tend to diminish the expense; but he considered this object as very inconsiderable when compared with that of having a fair and full representation of the people of the United States.

Mr. AMES's motion was now put, and lost by a large majority.

Mr. SEDGWICK.—When he reflected on the country, and the increase of population which was likely to take place, he was led to believe that one hundred and seventy-five members would be a body rather too small to represent such extensive concerns; for this reason he would move to strike out a hundred and seventy-five and insert two hundred.

Mr. SHERMAN said, if they were now forming a Constitution, he should be in favor of one representative for forty thousand, rather than thirty thousand. The proportion by which the several States are now represented in this House was founded on the former calculation. In the convention that framed the Constitution, there was a majority in favor of forty thousand, and though there were some in favor of thirty thousand, yet that proposition did not obtain until after the Constitution was agreed to, when the President had expressed a wish that thirty thousand should be inserted, as more favorable to the public interest; during the contest between thirty and forty thousand, he believed there were not more than nine States who voted in favor of the former.

The objects of the Federal Government were fewer than those of the State Government; they did not require an equal degree of local knowledge; the only case, perhaps, where local knowledge would be advantageous, was in laying direct taxes; but here they were freed from an embarrassment, because the arrangements of the several States might serve as a pretty good rule on which to found their measures.

So far was he from thinking a hundred and seventy-five insufficient, that he was about to move for a reduction, because he always considered that a small body deliberated to better purpose than a greater one.

Mr. MANSON hoped gentlemen would not be influenced by what had been related to have passed in the convention; he expected the committee would determine upon their own sense of propriety; though as several States had proposed the number of two hundred, he thought some substantial reason should be offered to induce the House to reject it.

Mr. LIVERMORE said, he did not like the amendment as it was reported; he approved of the ratio being one for thirty thousand, but he wished the number of representatives might be increased in proportion as the population of the country increased, until the number of representatives amounted to two hundred.

Mr. TUCKER said, the honorable gentleman who spoke last had anticipated what he was going to remark. It appeared to him that the committee had looked but a very little way forward when they agreed to fix the representation at one hundred members, on a ratio of one to every thirty thousand upon the first enumeration. He apprehended the United States would be found to comprehend nearly three millions of people, consequently they would give a hundred members. Now, by the amendment, it will be in the power of Congress to prevent any addition to that number; if it should be a prevalent opinion among the members of this House that a small body was better calculated to perform the public business than a larger one, they will never suffer their members to increase to a hundred and seventy-five, the number to which the amendment extended.

Mr. GEARY expressed himself in favor of extending the number to two hundred, and wished that the amendment might be so modified as to insure an increase in proportion to the increase of population.

Mr. SHERMAN was against any increase. He thought if a future House should be convinced of the impropriety of increasing this number to above one hundred, they ought to have it at their discretion to prevent it; and if that was likely to be the case, it was an argument why the present House should not decide. He did not consider that all that had been said with respect to the advantages of a large representation was founded upon experience; it had been intimated, that a large body was more incorruptible than a smaller one; this doctrine was not authenticated by any proof; he could invalidate it by an example notorious to every gentleman in this House; he alluded to the British House of Commons, which although it consisted of upwards of five hundred members, the Minister always contrived to procure votes enough to answer his purpose.

Mr. LAWRENCE said, that it was a matter of opinion upon which gentlemen held different sentiments, whether a greater or less number than a certain point was best for a deliberative body. But he apprehended that whatever number was now fixed would be continued by a future Congress, if it were left to their discretion. He formed this opinion from the influence of the Senate, in which the small States were represented in an equal proportion with the larger ones. He supposed that the Senators from New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Jersey, and Delaware, would ever oppose an augmentation of the number of representatives; because their influence in the House would be proportionably abated. These States were incapable of extending their population beyond a certain point, inasmuch as they were confined with respect to territory. If, therefore, they could never have more than one representative, they would hardly consent to double that of others, by which their own importance would be diminished. If such a measure was carried by the large States through this House, it might be successfully opposed in the Senate; he would, therefore, be in favor of increasing the number to two hundred, and making its increase gradual till it arrived at that height.

Mr. GEARY.—The presumption is, that if provision is not made for the increase of the House of Representatives, by the present Congress, the increase never will be made. Gentlemen ought to consider the difference between the Government in its infancy and when well established. The people suppose their liberties somewhat endangered; they have expressed their wishes to have them secured, and instructed their representatives to endeavor to obtain for them certain amendments, which they imagine will be adequate to the object they have in view. Besides this, there are two States not in the Union; but which we hope to annex to it by the amendments now under deliberation. These are inducements for us to proceed and adopt this amendment, independent of the propriety of the amendment itself, and such inducements as no future Congress will have, the principle of self-interest and self-importance will always operate on them to prevent any addition to the number of representatives. Cannot gentlemen contemplate a difference in situation between this and a future Congress on other accounts? We have neither money nor force to administer the Constitution; but this will not be the case hereafter. In the progress of this Government its revenues will increase, and an army will be established; a future Legislature will find other means to influence the people than now exist.

This circumstance proves that we ought to leave as little as possible to the discretion of the future Government: but it by no means proves that the present Congress ought not to adopt the amendment moved by my colleague, Mr. SEDGWICK.

Mr. AMES.—It has been observed that there will be an indisposition in future Legislatures to increase the number of representatives. I am by no means satisfied that this observation is true. I think there are motives which will influence Legislatures of the best kind to increase the number of its members. There is a constant tendency in a republican Government to multiply what it thinks to be the popular branch. If we consider that men are often more attached to their places than they are to their principles, we shall not be surprised to see men of the most refined judgment advocating a measure which will increase their chance of continuing in office.

My honorable colleague has intimated that a future Legislature will be against extending the number of this branch; and that if the people are displeased, they will have it in their power, by force, to compel their acquiescence. I do not see, sir, how the Legislature is strengthened by the increase of an army. I have generally understood that it gave power to the Executive arm, but not to the deliberative head: the example of every nation is against him. Nor can I conceive upon what foundation he rests his reasoning. If there is a natural inclination in the Government to increase the number of administrators, it will be prudent in us to endeavor to counteract its baneful influence.

Mr. LIVERMORE now proposed to strike out the words "one hundred," and insert "two hundred." Mr. SEDGWICK suspended his motion until this question was determined; whereupon it was put and lost, there being twenty-two in favor of, and twenty-seven against it.

Mr. SEDGWICK's motion was then put, and carried in the affirmative.

Mr. LIVERMORE wished to amend the clause of the report in such a manner as to prevent the power of Congress from deciding the rate of increase. He thought the Constitution had better fix it, and let it be gradual until it arrived at two hundred. After which, if it was the sense of the committee, it might be stationary, and liable to no other variation than that of being apportioned among the members of the Union.

Mr. AMES suggested to the consideration of gentlemen, whether it would not be better to arrange the subject in such a way as to let the representation be proportioned to a ratio of one for thirty thousand at the first census, and one for forty thousand at the second, so as to prevent a too rapid increase of the number of members. He did not make a motion of this nature, because he conceived it to be out of order, after the late decision of the committee; but it might be brought forward in the House, and he hoped would accommodate both sides.

Mr. GEARY wished that the gentleman last up would pen down the idea he had just thrown out; he thought it very proper for the consideration of the House.

The question on the second proposition of the report, as amended, was now put and carried, being twenty-seven for, and twenty-two against it.

This next proposition in the report was as follows:

Article I, Section 6. Between the words "United States," and "shall in all cases," strike out "they," and insert "but no law varying the compensation shall take effect, until an election of representatives shall have intervened. The members."

Mr. SEDGWICK thought much inconvenience and but very little good would result from this amendment; it might serve as a tool for designing men; they might reduce the wages very low, much lower than it was possible for any gentleman to serve without injury to his private affairs, in order to procure popularity at home, provided a diminution of pay was looked upon as a desirable thing. It might also be done, in order to prevent men of shining and disinterested abilities, but of indigent circumstances, from rendering their fellow-citizens those services they are well able to perform, and render a seat in this House less eligible than it ought to be.

Mr. Vining thought every future Legislature would feel a degree of gratitude to the preceding one, which had performed so disagreeable a task for them. The committee who had made this a part of their report, had been guided by a single reason, but which appeared to them a sufficient one. There was, to say the least of it, a disagreeable sensation occasioned by leaving it in the breast of any man to set a value on his own work; it is true it is unavoidable in the present House, but it might, and ought to be avoided in future; he therefore hoped it would obtain without any difficulty.

Mr. GERRY would be in favor of this clause, if they could find means to secure an adequate representation; but he apprehended that it would be considerably endangered; he should therefore be against it.

Mr. MADISON thought the representation would be as well secured under this clause as it would be if it was omitted; and as it was desired by a great number of the people of America, he would consent to it, though he was not convinced it was absolutely necessary.

Mr. SNOWICK remarked once more, that the proposition had two aspects which made it disagreeable to him; the one was to render a man popular to his constituents, the other to render the place ineligible to his competitor.

He thought there was very little danger of an abuse of the power of laying down their own wages; gentlemen were generally more inclined to make them moderate than excessive.

The question being put on the proposition, it was carried in the affirmative, twenty-seven for, and twenty against it.

The committee then rose and reported progress, and the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, August 15.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The House again went into a Committee of the Whole on the proposed amendment to the Constitution, Mr. BOUNDNOT in the Chair.

The fourth proposition being under consideration, as follows:

Article 1. Section 9. Between paragraphs two and three insert "no religion shall be established by law, nor shall the equal rights of conscience be infringed."

Mr. SYLVESTER had some doubts of the propriety of the mode of expression used in this paragraph. He apprehended that it was liable to a construction different from what had been made by the committee. He feared it might be thought to have a tendency to abolish religion altogether.

Mr. Vining suggested the propriety of transposing the two members of the sentence

Mr. GERRY said it would read better if it was, that no religious doctrine shall be established by law.

Mr. SHERMAN thought the amendment altogether unnecessary, inasmuch as Congress had no authority whatever delegated to them by the Constitution to make religious establishments; he would, therefore, move to have it struck out.

Mr. CARTOLL.—As the rights of conscience are, in their nature, of peculiar delicacy, and will little bear the gentlest touch of governmental hand; and as many acts have concurred in opinion that they are not well secured under the present Constitution, he said he was much in favor of adopting the words. He thought it would tend more towards conciliating the minds of the people to the Government than almost any other amendment he had heard proposed. He would not contend with gentlemen about the phraseology, his object was to secure the substance in such a manner, as to satisfy the wishes of the honest part of the community.

Mr. MADISON said, he apprehended the meaning of the words to be, that Congress should not establish a religion, and enforce the legal observance of it by law, nor compel men to worship God in any manner contrary to their conscience. Whether the words are necessary or not, he did not mean to say, but they had been required by some of the State Conventions, who seemed to entertain an opinion that under the clause of the Constitution, which gave power to Congress to make all laws necessary and proper to carry into execution the Constitution, and the laws made under it, enabled them to make laws of such a nature as might infringe the rights of conscience, and establish a national religion; to prevent these effects he presumed the amendment was intended, and he thought it as well expressed as the nature of the language would admit.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said that he feared, with the gentleman first up on this subject, that the words might be taken in such latitude as to be extremely hurtful to the cause of religion. He understood the amendment to mean what had been expressed by the gentleman from Virginia; but others might find it convenient to put another construction upon it. The ministers of their congregations to the Eastward were maintained by the contributions of those who belonged to their society; the expense of building meeting-houses was contributed in the same manner. These things were regulated by by-laws. If an action was brought before a Federal Court on any of these cases, the person who had neglected to perform his engagements could not be compelled to do it; for a support of ministers or building of places of worship might be construed into a religious establishment.

By the charter of Rhode Island, no religion could be established by law; he could give a history of the effects of such a regulation; indeed the people were now enjoying the blessed fruits of it. He hoped, therefore, the amendment would be made in such a way as to secure the rights of conscience, and a free exercise of the rights of religion, but not to patronize those who professed no religion at all.

Mr. MADISON thought, if the word "national" was inserted before religion, it would satisfy the minds of honorable gentlemen. He believed that the people feared one sect might obtain a pre-eminence, or two combine together, and establish a religion to which they would compel others to conform. He thought if the word "national" was introduced, it would point the amendment directly to the object it was intended to prevent.

Mr. LIVERMORE was not satisfied with that amendment; but he did not wish them to dwell long on the subject. He thought it would be better if it were altered, and made to read in this manner, that Congress shall make no laws touching religion, or infringing the rights of conscience.

Mr. GERRY did not like the term national, proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, and he hoped it would not be adopted by the House. It brought to his mind some observations that had taken place in the conventions at the time they were considering the present Constitution. It had been insisted upon by those who were called anti-federalists, that this form of Government consolidated the Union; the honorable gentleman's motion shows that he considers it in the same light. Those who were called anti-federalists at that time, complained that they had injustice done them by the title, because they were in favor of a Federal Government, and the others were in favor of a national one; the federalists were for ratifying the Constitution as it stood, and the others not until amendments were made. Their names then ought not to have been distinguished by federalists and anti-federalists, but rats and anti-rats.

Mr. MADISON withdrew his motion, but observed that the words "no national religion shall be established by law" did not imply that the Government was a national one; the question was then taken on Mr. LIVERMORE's motion, and passed in the affirmative, thirty-one for, and twenty against it.

The next clause of the fourth proposition was taken into consideration, and was as follows: "The freedom of speech and of the press, and the right of the people peaceably to assemble and consult for their common good, and to apply to the Government for redress of grievances, shall not be infringed."

Mr. SNOWICK submitted to those gentlemen who had contemplated the subject, what effect such an amendment as this would have; he feared it would tend to make them appear trifling in the eyes of their constituents; what, said he, shall we secure the freedom of speech, and think it necessary, at the same time, to allow the right of assembling? If people freely converse together, they must assemble for that purpose; it is a self-evident, unalienable right which the people possess; it is certainly a thing that never would be called in question; it is derogatory to the dignity of the House to descend to such minutiae; he therefore moved to strike out "assemble and."

Mr. BENSON.—The committee who framed this report proceeded on the principle that these rights belonged to the people; they conceived them to be inherent; and all that they meant to provide against was their being infringed by the Government.

Mr. SNOWICK replied, that if the committee were governed by that general principle, they might have gone into a very lengthy enumeration of rights; they might have declared that a man should have a right to wear his hat if he pleased; that he might get up when he pleased, and go to bed when he thought proper; but he would ask the gentleman whether he thought it necessary to enter these trifles in a declaration of rights, in a Government where none of them were intended to be infringed.

Mr. TUCKER hoped the words would not be struck out, for he considered them of importance; besides, they were recommended by the States of Virginia and North Carolina, though he noticed that the most material part proposed by those States was omitted, which was a declaration that the people should have a right to instruct their representatives. He would move to have those words inserted as soon as the motion for striking out was decided.

Mr. GERRY was also against the words being struck out, because he conceived it to be an essential right; it was inserted in the constitutions of several States; and though it had been abused in the year 1786 in Massachusetts, yet that abuse ought not to operate as an argument against the use of it. The people ought to be secure in the peaceable enjoyment of this privilege, and that can only be done by making a declaration to that effect in the Constitution.

Mr. PAGE.—The gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. SNOWICK,) who made this motion, objects to the clause, because the right is of so trivial a nature. He supposes it no more essential than whether a man has a right to wear his hat or not; but let me observe to him that such rights have been opposed, and a man has been obliged to pull off his hat when he appeared before the face of authority; people have also been prevented from assembling together on their lawful occasions, therefore it is well to guard against such stretches of authority, by inserting the privilege in the declaration of rights. If the people could be deprived of the power of assembling under any pretext whatsoever, they might be deprived of every other privilege contained in the clause.

Mr. Vining said, if the thing were harmless, and it would tend to gratify the States that had proposed amendments, he should agree to it.

Mr. HARTLEY observed, that it had been asserted in the convention of Pennsylvania, by the friends of the Constitution, that all the rights and powers that were not given to the Government, were retained by the States and the people thereof. This was also his own opinion; but as four or five States had required to be secured in those rights by an express declaration in the Constitution, he was disposed to gratify them; he thought every thing that was not incompatible with the general good, ought to be granted, if it would tend to obtain the confidence of the people in the Government; and, upon the whole, he thought these words were as necessary to be inserted in the declaration of rights as most in the clause.

Amendments to the Constitution.

Mr. GERRY said, that his colleague contended for nothing, if he supposed that the people had a right to consult for the common good, because they could not consult unless they met for the purpose.

Mr. SEDGWICK replied, that if they were understood or implied in the word consult, they were utterly unnecessary, and upon that ground he moved to have them struck out.

The question was now put upon Mr. SEDGWICK's motion, and lost by a considerable majority.

Mr. TUCKER then moved to insert these words: "to instruct their representatives."

Mr. HARTLEY wished the motion had not been made, for gentlemen acquainted with the circumstances of this country, and the history of the country from which we separated, differed exceedingly on this point. The members of the House of Representatives, said he, are chosen for two years, the members of the Senate for six.

According to the principles laid down in the Constitution, it is presumable that the persons elected know the interests and the circumstances of their constituents, and being checked in their determinations by a division of the Legislative power into two branches, there is little danger of error. At least it ought to be supposed that they have the confidence of the people during the period for which they are elected; and if, by misconduct, they forfeit it, their constituents have the power of leaving them out at the expiration of that time—thus they are answerable for the part they have taken in measures that may be contrary to the general wish.

Representation is the principle of our Government; the people ought to have confidence in the honor and integrity of those they send forward to transact their business; their right to instruct them is a problematical subject. We have seen it attended with bad consequences, both in England and America. When the passions of the people are excited, instructions have been resorted to and obtained to answer party purposes; and although the public opinion is generally respectable, yet at such moments it has been known to be often wrong; and happy is that Government composed of men of firmness and wisdom to discover and resist popular error.

If, in a small community, where the interests, habits, and manners, are neither so numerous nor diversified, instructions bind not, what shall we say of instructions to this body? Can it be supposed that the inhabitants of a single district in a State are better informed with respect to the general interests of the Union, than a select body assembled from every part? Can it be supposed that a part will be more desirous of promoting the good of the whole than the whole will of the part? I apprehend, sir, that Congress will be the best judges of proper measures, and that instructions will never be resorted to but for party purposes, when they will generally contain the prejudices and acrimony of the party, rather than the dictates of honest reason and sound policy.

In England, this question has been considerably agitated. The representatives of some towns in Parliament have acknowledged and submitted to the binding force of instructions, while the majority has thrown off the shackles with disdain. I would not have this precedent influence our decision; but let the doctrine be tried upon its own merits, and stand or fall as it shall be found to deserve.

It appears to my mind that the principle of representation is distinct from any agency which may require written instructions. The great end of meeting is to consult for the common good; but can the common good be discerned without the object is reflected and shown in every light?

A local or partial view does not necessarily enable any man to comprehend it clearly; this can only result from an inspection into the aggregate. Instructions viewed in this light will be found to embarrass the best and wisest men. And were all the members to take their seats in order to obey instructions, and those instructions were as various as it is probable they would be, what possibility would there exist of so accommodating each to the other as to produce any act whatever? Perhaps a majority of the whole might not be instructed to agree to any one point, and is it thus the people of the United States propose to form a more perfect union, provide for the common defence, and promote the general welfare?

Sir, I have known within my own time so many inconveniences and real evils arise from adopting the popular opinions on the moment, that although I respect them as much as any man, I hope this Government will particularly guard against them, at least that they will not bind themselves by a Constitutional act, and by oath, to submit to their influence; if they do, the great object which this Government has been established to attain will inevitably elude our grasp on the uncertain and veering winds of popular commotion.

Mr. PAGE.—The gentleman from Pennsylvania tells you that in England this principle is doubted; how far this is consonant with the nature of the Government I will not pretend to say; but I am not astonished to find that the administrators of a monarchical Government are unassailable by the weak voice of the people; but under a democracy, whose great end is to form a code of laws congenial with the public sentiment, the popular opinion ought to be collected and attended to. Our present object is, I presume, to secure to our constituents and to posterity these inestimable rights. Our Government is derived from the people, of consequence the people have a right to consult for the common good; but to what end will this be done, if they have not the power of instructing their representatives? Instruction and representation in a Republic appear to me to be inseparably connected; but were I the subject of a monarch, I should doubt whether the public good did not depend more upon the prince's will than the will of the people. I should dread a popular assembly consulting for the public good, because, under its influence, commotions and tumults might arise that would shake the foundation of the monarch's throne, and make the empire tremble in expectation. The people of England have submitted the Crown to the Hanover family, and have rejected the Stuarts. If instructions upon such a revolution were considered binding, it is difficult to know what would have been the effects. It might be well, therefore, to have the doctrine exploded from that kingdom; but it will not be advanced as a substantial reason in favor of our treading in the same steps.

Amendments to the Constitution.

The honorable gentleman has said, that when once the people have chosen a representative, they must rely on his integrity and judgment during the period for which he is elected. I think, sir, to doubt the authority of the people to instruct their representatives, will give them just cause to be alarmed for their fate. I look upon it as a dangerous doctrine, subversive of the great end for which the United States have confederated. Every friend of mankind, every well-wisher of his country, will be desirous of obtaining the sense of the people on every occasion of magnitude; but how can this be so well expressed as in instructions to their representatives? I hope, therefore, that gentlemen will not oppose the insertion of it in this part of the report.

Mr. CLYMER.—I hope the amendment will not be adopted; but if our constituents choose to instruct us, that they may be left at liberty to do so. Do gentlemen foresee the extent of these words? If they have a Constitutional right to instruct us, it infers that we are bound by those instructions; and as we ought not to decide Constitutional questions by implication, I presume we shall be called upon to go further, and expressly declare the members of the Legislature bound by the instruction of their constituents. This is a most dangerous principle, utterly destructive of all ideas of an independent and deliberative body, which are essential requisites in the Legislatures of free Governments; they prevent men of abilities and experience from rendering those services to the community that are in their power, destroying the object contemplated by establishing an efficient General Government, and rendering Congress a mere passive machine.

Mr. SHERMAN.—It appears to me, that the words are calculated to mislead the people, by conveying an idea that they have a right to control the debates of the Legislature. This cannot be admitted to be just, because it would destroy the object of their meeting. I think, when the people have chosen a representative, it is his duty to meet others from the different parts of the Union, and consult, and agree with them to such acts as are for the general benefit of the whole community. If they were to be guided by instructions, there would be no use in deliberation; all that a man would have to do, would be to produce his instructions, and lay them on the table, and let them speak for him. From hence I think it may be fairly inferred, that the right of the people to consult for the common good can go no further than to petition the Legislature, or apply for a redress of grievances. It is the duty of a good representative to inquire what measures are most likely to promote the general welfare, and, after he has discovered them, to give them his support. Should his instructions, therefore, coincide with his ideas on any measure, they would be unnecessary; if they were contrary to the conviction of his own mind, he must be bound by every principle of justice to disregard them.

Mr. JACKSON was in favor of the right of the people to assemble and consult for the common good; it had been used in this country as one of the best checks on the British Legislature in their unjustifiable attempts to tax the colonies without their consent. America had no representatives in the British Parliament, therefore they could instruct none, yet they exercised the power of consultation to a good effect. He begged gentlemen to consider the dangerous tendency of establishing such a doctrine; it would necessarily drive the House into a number of factions. There might be different instructions from every State, and the representation from each State would be a faction to support its own measures.

If we establish this as a right, we shall be bound by those instructions; now, I am willing to leave both the people and representatives to their own discretion on this subject. Let the people consult and give their opinion; let the representative judge of it; and if it is just, let him govern himself by it as a good member ought to do; but if it is otherwise, let him have it in his power to reject their advice.

What may be the consequence of binding a man to vote in all cases according to the will of others? He is to decide upon a Constitutional point, and on this question his conscience is bound by the obligation of a solemn oath; you now involve him in a serious dilemma. If he votes according to his conscience, he decides against his instructions; but in deciding against his instructions, he commits a breach of the Constitution, by infringing the prerogative of the people, secured to them by this declaration. In short, it will give rise to such a variety of absurdities and inconsistencies, as no prudent Legislature would wish to involve themselves in.

Mr. GERRY.—By the checks provided in the Constitution, we have good grounds to believe that the very framers of it conceived that the Government would be liable to mal-administration, and I presume that the gentlemen of this House do not mean to arrogate to themselves more perfection than human nature has as yet been found to be capable of; if they do not, they will admit an additional check against abuses which this, like every other Government, is subject to. Instruction from the people will furnish this in a considerable degree.

It has been said that the amendment proposed by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. TUCKER) determines this point, "that the people can bind their representatives to follow their instructions." I do not conceive that this necessarily follows. I think the representative, notwithstanding the insertion of these words, would be at liberty to act as he pleased; if he declined to pursue such measures as he was directed to attain, the people would have a right to refuse him their suffrages at a future election.

Now, though I do not believe the amendment would bind the representatives to obey the instructions, yet I think the people have a right both to instruct and bind them. Do gentlemen conceive that on any occasion instructions would be so general as to proceed from all our constituents? If they do, it is the sovereign will; for gentlemen will not contend that the sovereign will presides in the Legislature. The friends and patrons of this Constitution have always declared that the sovereignty resides in the people, and that they do not part with it on any occasion; to say the sovereignty vests in the people, and that they have not a right to instruct and control their representatives, is absurd to the last degree. They must either give up their principle, or grant that the people have a right to exercise their sovereignty to control the whole Government as well as this branch of it. But the amendment does not carry the principle to such an extent, it only declares the right of the people to send instructions; the representative will, if he thinks proper, communicate his instructions to the House, but how far they shall operate on his conduct he will judge for himself.

The honorable gentleman from Georgia (Mr. Jackson) supposes that instructions will tend to generate factions in this House; but he did not see how it could have that effect, any more than the freedom of debate had. If the representative entertains the same opinion with his constituents, he will decide with them in favor of the measure; if other gentlemen, who are not instructed on this point, are convinced by argument that the measure is proper, they will also vote with them; consequently, the influence of debate and of instruction is the same.

The gentleman says further, that the people have the right of instructing their representatives; if so, why not declare it? Does he mean that it shall lie dormant and never be exercised? If so, it will be a right of no utility. But much good may result from a declaration in the Constitution that they possess this privilege; the people will be encouraged to come forward with their instructions, which will form a fund of useful information for the Legislature. We cannot, I apprehend, be too well informed of the true state, condition, and sentiment of our constituents, and perhaps this is the best mode in our power of obtaining information. I hope we shall never shut our ears against that information which is to be derived from the petitions and instructions of our constituents. I hope we shall never presume to think that all the wisdom of this country is concentrated within the walls of this House. Men, unambitious of distinctions from their fellow-citizens, remain within their own domestic walk, unheeded of and unseen, possessing all the advantages resulting from a watchful observance of public men and public measures, whose voice, if we would descend to listen to it, would give us knowledge superior to what could be acquired amidst the cares and bustles of a public life; let us then adopt the amendment, and encourage the diffident to enrich our stock of knowledge with the treasure of their remarks and observations.

Mr. Madison.—I think the committee acted prudently in omitting to insert these words in the report they have brought forward; if, unfortunately, the attempt of proposing amendments should prove abortive, it will not arise from the want of a disposition in the friends of the Constitution to do what is right with respect to securing the rights and privileges of the people of America, but from the difficulties arising from discussing and proposing abstract propositions, of which the judgment may not be convinced. I venture to say, that if we confine ourselves to an enumeration of simple, acknowledged principles, the ratification will meet with but little difficulty. Amendments of a doubtful nature will have a tendency to prejudice the whole system; the proposition now suggested partakes highly of this nature. It is doubted by many gentlemen here; it has been objected to in intelligent publications throughout the Union; it is doubted by many members of the State Legislatures. In one sense this declaration is true, in many others it is certainly not true; in the sense in which it is true, we have asserted the right sufficiently in what we have done; if we mean nothing more than this, that the people have a right to express and communicate their sentiments and wishes, we have provided for it already. The right of freedom of speech is secured; the liberty of the press is expressly declared to be beyond the reach of this Government; the people may therefore publicly address their representatives, may privately advise them, or declare their sentiments by petition to the whole body; in all these ways they may communicate their will. If gentlemen mean to go further, and to say that the people have a right to instruct their representatives in such a sense as that the delegates are obliged to conform to those instructions, the declaration is not true. Suppose they instruct a representative, by his vote, to violate the Constitution; is he at liberty to obey such instructions? Suppose he is instructed to patronize certain measures, and from circumstances known to him, but not to his constituents, he is convinced that they will endanger the public good; is he obliged to sacrifice his own judgment to them? Is he absolutely bound to perform what he is instructed to do? Suppose he refuses, will his vote be the less valid, or the community be disengaged from that obedience which is due to the laws of the Union? If his vote must inevitably have the same effect, what sort of a right is this in the Constitution, to instruct a representative who has a right to disregard the order, if he pleases? In this sense the right does not exist, in the other sense it does exist, and is provided largely for.

The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts asks if the sovereignty is not with the people at large. Does he infer that the people can, in detached bodies, contravene an act established by the whole people? My idea of the sovereignty of the people is, that the people can change the Constitution if they please; but while the Constitution exists, they must conform themselves to its dictates. But I do not believe that the inhabitants of any district can speak the voice of the people; so far from it, their ideas may contradict the sense of the whole people; hence the consequence that instructions are binding on the representative is of a doubtful, if not a dangerous nature. I do not conceive, therefore, that it is necessary to agree to the proposition now made; so far as any real good is to arise from it, so far that real good is provided for; so far as it is of a doubtful nature, so far it obliges us to run the risk of losing the whole system.

Mr. Smith, of South Carolina.—I am opposed to this motion, because I conceive it will operate as a partial inconvenience to the more distant States. If every member is to be bound by instructions how to vote, what are gentlemen from the extremities of the continent to do? Members from the neighboring States can obtain their instructions earlier than those from the Southern ones, and I presume that particular instructions will be necessary for particular measures; of consequence, we vote perhaps against instructions on their way to us, or we must decline voting at all. But what is the necessity of having a numerous representation? One member from a State can receive the instructions, and by his vote answer all the purposes of many, provided his vote is allowed to count for the proportion the State ought to send; in this way the business might be done at a less expense than having one or two hundred members in the House, which had been strongly contended for yesterday.

Mr. Stone.—I think the clause would change the Government entirely; instead of being a Government founded upon representation, it would be a democracy of singular properties.

I differ from the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Madison,) if he thinks this clause would not bind the representative; in my opinion, it would bind him effectually, and I venture to assert, without diffidence, that any law passed by the Legislature would be of no force, if a majority of the members of this House were instructed to the contrary, provided the amendment became part of the Constitution. What would follow from this? Instead of looking in the code of laws passed by Congress, your Judiciary would have to collect and examine the instructions from the various parts of the Union. It follows very clearly from hence, that the Government would be altered from a representative one to a democracy, where in all laws are made immediately by the voice of the people.

This is a power not to be found in any part of the earth except among the Swiss cantons; there the body of the people vote upon the laws, and give instructions to their delegates. But here we have a different form of Government; the people at large are not authorized under it to vote upon the law, nor did I ever hear that any man required it. Why, then, are we called upon to propose amendments subversive of the principles of the Constitution, which were never desired?

Several members now called for the question, and the Chairman being about to put the same: Mr. Gerry.—Gentlemen seem in a great hurry to get this business through. I think, Mr. Chairman, it requires a further discussion; for my part, I had rather do less business and do it well, than precipitate measures before they are fully understood.

The honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Madison,) stated, that if the proposed amendments are defeated, it will be by the delay attending the discussion of doubtful propositions; and he declares this to partake of that quality. It is natural, sir, for us to be fond of our own work. We do not like to see it disfigured by other hands. That honorable gentleman brought forward a string of propositions; among them was the clause now proposed to be amended: he is no doubt ready for the question, and determined not to admit what we think an improvement. The gentlemen who were on the committee, and brought in the report, have considered the subject, and are also ripe for a decision. But other gentlemen may crave a like indulgence. Is not the report before us for deliberation and discussion, and to obtain the sense of the House upon it; and will not gentlemen allow us a day or two for these purposes, after they have forced us to proceed upon them at this time? I appeal to their candor and good sense on the occasion, and am sure not to be refused; and I must inform them now, that they may not be surprised hereafter, that I wish all the amendments proposed by the respective States to be considered. Gentlemen say it is necessary to finish the subject, in order to reconcile a number of our fellow-citizens to the Government. If this is their principle, they ought to consider the wishes and intentions which the convention has expressed for them; if they do this, they will find that they expect and wish for the declaration proposed by the honorable gentleman over the way, (Mr. Tucker,) and, of consequence, they ought to agree to it; and why it, with others recommended in the same way, were not reported, I cannot pretend to say; the committee know this best themselves.

The honorable gentleman near me (Mr. Stone) says, that the laws passed contrary to instruction will be nugatory. And other gentlemen ask, if their constituents instruct them to violate the Constitution, whether they must do it. Sir, does not the Constitution declare that all laws passed by Congress are paramount to the laws and constitutions of the several States. If our decrees are of such force as to set aside the State laws and constitutions, certainly they may be repugnant to any instructions whatever, without being injured thereby. But can we conceive that our constituents would be so absurd as to instruct us to violate our oath, and act directly contrary to the principles of a Government ordained by themselves? We must look upon them to be abso-lately abandoned and false to their own interests, to suppose them capable of giving such instructions.

If this amendment is introduced into the Constitution, I do not think we shall be much troubled with instructions; a knowledge of the right will operate to check a spirit that would render instruction necessary.

The honorable gentleman from Virginia asked, will not the affirmative of a member who votes repugnant to his instructions bind the community as much as the votes of those who conform? There is no doubt, sir, but it will; but does this tend to show that the constituent has no right to instruct? Surely not. I admit, sir, that instructions contrary to the Constitution ought not to bind, though the sovereignty resides in the people. The honorable gentleman acknowledges that the sovereignty vests there; if so, it may exercise its will in any case not inconsistent with a previous contract. The same gentleman asks if we are to give the power to the people in detached bodies to contravene the Government while it exists. Certainly not; nor does the proposed proposition extend to that point; it is only intended to open for them a convenient mode in which they may convey their sense to their agents. The gentleman therefore takes for granted what is inadmissible, that Congress will always be doing illegal things, and make it necessary for the sovereign to declare its pleasure.

He says the people have a right to alter the Constitution, but they have no right to oppose the Government. If, while the Government exists, they have no right to control it, it appears they have divested themselves of the sovereignty over the Constitution. Therefore, our language, with our principles, must change, and we ought to say that the sovereignty existed in the people previous to the establishment of this Government. This will be ground for alarm indeed, if it is true; but I trust, sir, too much to the good sense of my fellow-citizens ever to believe that the doctrine will generally obtain in this country of freedom.

Mr. Vining.—If, Mr. Chairman, there appears on one side too great an urgency to despatch this business, there appears on the other an unnecessary delay and procrastination equally improper and unpardonable. I think this business has been already well considered by the House, and every gentleman in it; however, I am not for an unseemly expedition.

The gentleman last up has insinuated a reflection upon the committee for not reporting all the amendments proposed by some of the State conventions. I can assign a reason for this. The committee conceived some of them superfluous or dangerous, and found many of them so contradictory that it was impossible to make any thing of them; and this is a circumstance the gentleman cannot pretend ignorance of.

Is it not inconsistent in that honorable member to complain of hurry, when he wastes day after day reiterating the same train of arguments, and demanding the attention of this body by rising six or seven time on a question? I wish, sir, this subject discussed coolly and dispassionately, but hope we shall have no more repetitions or tedious discussions; let gentlemen try to expedite public business, and their arguments will be conducted in a laconic and consistent manner. As to the business of instruction, I look upon it as inconsistent with the general good. Suppose our constituents were to instruct us to make paper money; no gentleman pretends to say it would be unconstitutional, yet every honest mind must shudder at the thought. How can we then assert that instructions ought to bind us in all cases not contrary to the Constitution?

Mr. Livermore was not very anxious whether the words were inserted or not, but he had a great deal of doubt on the meaning of this whole amendment; it provides that the people may meet and consult for the common good. Does this mean a part of the people in a township or district, or does it mean the representatives in the State Legislatures? If it means the latter, there is no occasion for a provision that the Legislature may instruct the members of this body.

In some States the representatives are chosen by districts. In such case, perhaps, the instructions may be considered as coming from the district; but in other States, each representative is chosen by the whole people. In New Hampshire is the case; the instructions of any particular place would have but little weight, but a Legislative instruction would have considerable influence upon each representative. If, therefore, the words mean that the Legislature may instruct, he presumed it would have considerable effect, though he did not believe it binding. Indeed, he was inclined to pay a deference to any information he might receive from any number of gentlemen, even by a private letter; but as for full binding force, no instructions contained that quality. They could not, and ought not to have it, because different parties pursue different measures; and it might be expedient, nay, absolutely necessary, to sacrifice them in mutual concessions.

The doctrine of instructions would hold better in England than here, because the boroughs and corporations might have an interest to pursue totally immaterial to the rest of the Kingdom; in that case, it would be prudent to instruct their members in Parliament.

Mr. Gerry wished the Constitution amended without his having any hand in it; but if he must interfere, he would do his duty. The honorable gentleman from Delaware had given him an example of moderation and laconic and consistent debate that he meant to follow; and would just observe to the worthy gentleman last up, that several States had proposed the amendment, and among the rest New Hampshire.

There was one remark which escaped him, when he was up before. The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. Stowe) had said that the amendment would change the nature of the Government, and make it a democracy. Now he had always heard that it was a democracy; but perhaps he was misled, and the honorable gentleman was right in distinguishing it by some other appellation; perhaps an aristocracy was a term better adapted to it.

Mr. Snowick opposed the idea of the gentleman from New Hampshire, that the State Legislature had the power of instructing the members of this House; he looked upon it as a subordination of the rights of the people to admit such an authority. We stand not here, said he, the representatives of the State Legislatures, as under the former Congress, but as the representatives of the great body of the people. The sovereignty, the independence, and the rights of the States are intended to be guarded by the Senate; if we are to be viewed in any other light, the greatest security the people have for their rights and privileges is destroyed.

But with respect to instructions, it is well worthy of consideration how they are to be procured. It is not the opinion of an individual that is to control my conduct; I consider myself as the representative of the whole Union. An individual may give me information, but his sentiments may be in opposition to the sense of the majority of the people. If instructions are to be of any efficacy, they must speak the sense of the majority of the people, at least of a State. In a State so large as Massachusetts it will behoove gentlemen to consider how the sense of the majority of the freemen is to be obtained and communicated. Let us take care to avoid the insertion of crude and undigested propositions, more likely to produce acrimony than that spirit of harmony which we ought to cultivate.

Mr. Livermore said that he did not understand the honorable gentleman, or was not understood by him; he did not presume peremptorily to say what degree of influence the Legislative instructions would have on a representative. He knew it was not the thing in contemplation here; and what he had said respected only the influence it would have on his private judgment.

Mr. Ames said there would be a very great inconvenience attending the establishment of the doctrine contended for by his colleague. Those States which had selected their members by districts would have no right to give them instructions, consequently the members ought to withdraw; in which case the House might be reduced below a majority, and not be able, according to the Constitution, to do any business at all.

According to the doctrine of the gentleman from New Hampshire, one part of the Government would be annihilated; for of what avail is it that the people have the appointment of a representative, if he is to pay obedience to the dictates of another body?

Several members now rose and called for the question.

Mr. Paine was sorry to see gentlemen so impatient; the more so, as he saw there was very little attention paid to any thing that was said; but he would express his sentiments if he was only heard by the Chair. He discovered clearly, notwithstanding what had been observed by the most ingenious supporters of the opposition, that there was an absolute necessity for adopting the amendment. It was strictly compatible with the spirit and the nature of the Government; all power vests in the people of the United States; it is, therefore, a Government of the people, a democracy. If it were consistent with the peace and tranquillity of the inhabitants, every freeman would have a right to come and give his vote upon the law; but, inasmuch as this cannot be done by reason of the extent of territory, and some other causes, the people have agreed that their representatives shall exercise a part of their authority. To pretend to refuse them the power of instructing their agents appears to me to deny them a right. One gentleman asks how the instructions are to be collected. Many parts of this country have been in the practice of instructing their representatives; they found no difficulty in communicating their sense. Another gentleman asks if they were to instruct us to make paper money, what we would do. I would tell them, said he, it was unconstitutional; alter that, and we will consider on the point. Unless laws are made satisfactory to the people, they will lose their support, they will be abused or done away; this tends to destroy the efficiency of the Government.

It is the sense of several of the conventions that this amendment should take place; I think it my duty to support it, and fear it will spread an alarm among our constituents if we decline to do it.

Mr. Wadsworth.—Instructions have frequently been given to the representatives of the United States; but the people did not claim as a right that they should have any obligation upon the representatives; it is not right that they should. In troublesome times, designing men have drawn the people to instruct the representatives to their harm; the representatives have, on such occasions, refused to comply with their instructions. I have known, myself, that they have been disobeyed, and yet the representative was not brought to account for it; on the contrary, he was caressed and re-elected, while those who have obeyed them, contrary to their private sentiments, have ever after been despised for it. Now, if people considered it an inherent right in them to instruct their representatives, they would have undoubtedly punished the violation of them. I have no idea of instructions, unless they are obeyed; a discretionary power is incompatible with them.

The honorable gentleman who was up last says, if he were instructed to make paper money, he would tell his constituents it was unconstitutional. I believe that is not the case, for this body would have a right to make paper money; but if my constituents were to instruct me to vote for such a measure, I would disobey them, let the consequence be what it would.

Mr. Sturges.—The honorable gentlemen who are opposed to the motion of my colleague, do not treat it fairly. They suppose that it is meant to bind the representative to conform to his instructions. The mover of this question, I presume to say, has no such thing in idea. That they shall notice them and obey them, as far as is consistent and proper, may be very just; perhaps they ought to produce them to the House, and let them have as much influence as they deserve; nothing further, I believe, is contended for.

I rose on this occasion, not so much to make any observations upon the point immediately under consideration, as to beg the committee to consider the consequences that may result from an undue precipitancy and hurry. Nothing can distress me more than to be obliged to notice what I conceive to be somewhat improper in the conduct of so respectable a body. Gentlemen will reflect how difficult it is to remove error when once the passions are engaged in the discussion; temper and coolness are necessary to complete what must be the work of time. It cannot be denied but that the present Constitution is imperfect; we must, therefore, take time to improve it. If gentlemen are pressed for want of time, and are disposed to adjourn the session of Congress at a very early period, we had better drop the subject of amendments, and leave it until we have more leisure to consider and do the business effectually. For my part, I would rather sit till this day twelvemonth, than have this all-important subject inconsiderately passed over. The people have already complained that the adoption of the Constitution was done in too hasty a manner; what will they say of us if we press the amendments with so much haste?

Mr. BURKE.—It has been asserted, Mr. Chairman, that the people of America do not require this right. I beg leave to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, whether the Constitution of that State does not recognise that right, and the gentleman from Maryland, whether their declaration of rights does not expressly secure it to the inhabitants of that State? These circumstances, added to what has been proposed by the State conventions as amendments to this Constitution, pretty plainly declare the sense of the people to be in favor of securing to themselves and to their posterity a right of this nature.

Mr. SENEX said: that the declaration of rights prefixed to the Constitution of Maryland secured to every man a right of petitioning the Legislature for a redress of grievances, in a peaceable and orderly manner.

Mr. BURKE.—I am not positive with respect to the particular expression in the declaration of rights of the people of Maryland, but the Constitutions of Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and North Carolina, all of them recognise, in express terms, the right of the people to give instruction to their representatives. I do not mean to insist particularly upon this amendment; but I am very well satisfied that those that are reported and likely to be adopted by this House are very far from giving satisfaction to our constituents; they are not those solid and substantial amendments which the people expect; they are little better than whipsyllabub, frothy and full of wind, formed only to please the palate; or they are like a tub thrown out to a whale, to secure the freight of the ship and its peaceable voyage. In my judgment, the people will not be gratified by the mode we have pursued in bringing them forward. There was a committee of eleven appointed; and out of the number I think there were five who were members of the convention that formed the Constitution. Such gentlemen, having already given their opinion with respect to the perfection of the work, may be thought improper agents to bring forward amendments. Upon the whole, I think it will be found that we have done nothing but lose our time, and that it will be better to drop the subject now, and proceed to the organization of the Government.

Mr. SINICKSON inquired of Mr. Chairman what was the question before the committee, for really the debate had become so desultory, as to induce him to think it was lost sight of altogether. Mr. LAWRENCE was averse to entering on the business at first; but since they had proceeded so far, he hoped they would finish it. He said, if gentlemen would confine themselves to the question when they were speaking, that the business might be done in a more agreeable manner. He was against the amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. TUCKER,) because every member on this floor ought to consider himself the representative of the whole Union, and not of the particular district which had chosen him; as their decisions were to bind every individual of the confederated States, it was wrong to be guided by the voice of a single district, whose interests might happen to clash with those of the general good; and unless instructions were to be considered as binding, they were altogether superfluous.

Mr. MANISON was unwilling to take up any more of the time of the committee; but, on the other hand, he was not willing to be silent after the charges that had been brought against the committee, and the gentleman who introduced the amendments, by the honorable members on each side of him, (Messrs. SUMNER and BURKE.) Those gentlemen say that we are precipitating the business, and insinuate that we are not acting with candor. I appeal to the gentlemen who have heard the voice of their country, to those who have attended the debates of the State conventions, whether the amendments now proposed are not those most strenuously required by the opponents of the Constitution? It was wished that some security should be given for those great and essential rights which they have been taught to believe were in danger. I concurred in the convention of Virginia, with those gentlemen, so far as to agree to a declaration of those rights which corresponded with my own judgment, and the other alterations which I had the honor to bring forward before the present Congress. I appeal to the gentlemen on this floor who are desirous of amending the Constitution, whether those proposed are not compatible with what are required by our constituents? Have not the people been told that the rights of conscience, the freedom of speech, the liberty of the press, and trial by jury, were in jeopardy? that they ought not to adopt the Constitution until those important rights were secured to them?

But while I approve of these amendments, I should oppose the consideration at this time of such as are likely to change the principles of the Government, or that are of a doubtful nature; because I apprehend there is little prospect of obtaining the consent of two-thirds of both Houses of Congress, and three-fourths of the State Legislatures, to ratify propositions of this kind; therefore, as a friend to what is attainable, I would limit it to the plain, simple, and important security that has been required. If I were inclined to make no alteration in the Constitution, I would bring forward such amendments as were of a dubious cast, in order to have the whole rejected. Mr. BURKE never entertained an idea of charging gentlemen with the want of candor; but he would appeal to any man of sense and candor, whether the amendments contained in the report were any thing like the amendments required by the States of New York, Virginia, New Hampshire, and Carolina; and having these amendments in his hand, he turned to them to show the difference, concluding that all the important amendments were omitted in the report.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, understood his colleague, who had just sat down, to have asserted that the amendment under consideration was contained in the Constitution of the State of South Carolina; this was not the fact. Mr. BURKE said he mentioned the State of North Carolina, and there it was inserted in express terms.

The question was now called for from several parts of the House; but a desultory conversation took place before the question was put. At length the call becoming general, it was stated from the Chair, and determined in the negative, 10 rising in favor of it, and 41 against it.

The question was now taken on the second clause of the fourth proposition, as originally reported, and agreed to.

Mr. AMES moved the committee to rise and report progress; which being agreed to,

Mr. SPEAKER having resumed the Chair, Mr. AMES moved to discharge the committee from any further proceeding. He was led to make the motion from two considerations: first, that as the committee were not restrained in their discussions, a great deal of time was consumed in unnecessary debate; and, second, that as the Constitution required two-thirds of the House to acquiesce in amendments, the decisions of the committee, by a simple majority, might be set aside for the want of the Constitutional number to support them in the House. He further observed, that it might have an evil influence if alterations agreed to in committee were not adopted by the House.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, was in favor of the motion.

Mr. GERRY thought that the object of the motion was to prevent such a thorough discussion of the business as the nature of it demanded. He called upon gentlemen to recollect the consistency of his honorable colleague, who had proposed to refer the subject to a select committee, lest an open and full examination should lay bare the muscles and sinews of the Constitution. He had succeeded on that occasion, and the business was put into the hands of a select committee. He now proposed to curtail the debate, because gentlemen will not swallow the propositions as they stand, when their judgment and their duty require to have them improved. Will this House, said he, agree that an important subject like this shall have less consideration than the most trifling business yet come before us? I hope they will not. If they are tired of it, let it be postponed until another session, when it can be attended to with leisure and good temper. Gentlemen now feel the weather warm, and the subject is warm; no wonder it produces some degree of heat. Perhaps, as our next will be a winter session, we may go through more coolly and dispassionately.

Mr. SNOWICK seconded Mr. AMES's motion, thinking there was little probability of getting through with the business, if gentlemen were disposed to offer motions, and dwell long upon them in committee, when there was no likelihood they would meet the approbation of two-thirds of both Houses, and three-fourths of the State Legislatures.

Mr. GERRY moved to call the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. PAGE begged gentlemen to consider that the motion tended to deprive the members of that freedom of debate which they had heretofore been indulged in, and prevented the Speaker from giving his sentiments. He was sorry to see this hurry, and hoped the subject would be fairly treated, otherwise the people might think they were unjustly dealt by. They would have a right to suppose, with the honorable gentleman from Carolina, (Mr. BURKE,) that we meant nothing more than to throw out a tub to the whale.

Mr. BURKE would oppose the motion, and join in calling the yeas and nays, because its object must be to preclude debate. He was certain the subject was so variegated, and at the same time so important, that it could not be thoroughly discussed in any other manner than in a Committee of the Whole; and unless it was discussed in a satisfactory manner, he apprehended it would occasion a great deal of mischief. He said the people knew, and were sensible, that in ratifying the present Constitution, they parted with their liberties; but it was under a hope that they would get them back again. Whether this was to be the case or not, he left it to time to discover, but the spirit which now seemed to prevail in the House was no favorable omen. He begged gentlemen to treat the subject with fairness and candor, and not depart from their usual mode of doing business.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, had said he would support the motion, under an impression that it was useless to carry a measure through the committee, with a small majority, which was unlikely to meet the approbation of two-thirds of the House; but as gentlemen appeared so desirous of pursuing the common routine of doing business, he would withdraw his support.

Mr. TUCKER was in hopes the honorable member would have seen the impropriety of his motion, and have withdrawn it; but as he had not, he would presume to ask him upon what principle it was founded? Is it to precipitate the business, and prevent an investigation? or is it because the committee have spent some time on it and made no progress? He thought the latter was not the case, because the committee had proceeded as far in it as could reasonably be expected for the time. The gentleman says he is apprehensive it may do harm to have propositions agreed to in committee, and rejected by the House. Certainly there is no foundation for this apprehension, or the clause in the Constitution requiring the consent of two-thirds of the Legislature to amendments is formed on wrong principles. If the propositions are reasonable in themselves, they ought to be admitted; but if they are improper, they ought to be rejected. We would not presume to prevent our constituents from contemplating the subject in their own mind.

Is this haste produced by a desire to adjourn? He was as desirous of adjourning as any member, but he would not sacrifice the duty he owed the public to his own private convenience.

Mr. LIVERMORE hoped the gentleman would withdraw his motion, because it would have a disagreeable aspect to leave the business in the unfinished state it now stood. He thought it had better be altogether let alone.

Mr. ARES withdrew his motion, and laid another on the table, requiring two-thirds of the committee to carry a question; and, after some desultory conversation,

The House adjourned.

MONDAY, August 17.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The House again resolved itself into a committee, Mr. BOURNOR in the Chair, on the proposed amendments to the Constitution. The third clause of the fourth proposition in the report was taken into consideration, being as follows: "A well regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, being the best security of a free state, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed; but no person religiously scrupulous shall be compelled to bear arms."

Mr. GERRY.—This declaration of rights, I take it, is intended to secure the people against the mal-administration of the Government; if we could suppose that, in all cases, the rights of the people would be attended to, the occasion for guards of this kind would be removed. Now, I am apprehensive, sir, that this clause would give an opportunity to the people in power to destroy the Constitution itself. They can declare who are those religiously scrupulous, and prevent them from bearing arms.

What, sir, is the use of a militia? It is to prevent the establishment of a standing army, the bane of liberty. Now, it must be evident, that, under this provision, together with their other powers, Congress could take such measures with respect to a militia, as to make a standing army necessary. Whenever Governments mean to invade the rights and liberties of the people, they always attempt to destroy the militia, in order to raise an army upon their ruins. This was actually done by Great Britain at the commencement of the late Revolution. They used every means in their power to prevent the establishment of an effective militia to the Eastward. The Assembly of Massachusetts, seeing the rapid progress that administration were making to divest them of their inherent privileges, endeavored to counteract them by the organization of the militia; but they were always defeated by the influence of the Crown.

Mr. SENEY wished to know what question there was before the committee, in order to ascertain the point upon which the gentleman was speaking.

Mr. GERRY replied that he meant to make a motion, as he disapproved of the words as they stood. He, then, proceeded. No attempts that they made were successful, until they engaged in the struggle which emancipated them at once from their thralldom. Now, if we give a discretionary power to exclude those from militia duty who have religious scruples, we may as well make no provision on this head. For this reason, he wished the words to be altered so as to be confined to persons belonging to a religious sect scrupulous of bearing arms.

Mr. JACKSON did not expect that all the people of the United States would turn Quakers or Moravians; consequently one part would have to defend the other in case of invasion. Now, this, in his opinion, was unjust, unless the Constitution secured an equivalent; for this reason, he moved to amend the clause, by inserting at the end of it, "upon paying an equivalent, to be established by law."

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, inquired what were the words used by the conventions respecting this amendment. If the gentleman would conform to what was proposed by Virginia and Carolina, he would second him. He thought they were to be excused provided they found a substitute.

Mr. JACKSON was willing to accommodate. He thought the expression was, "No one, religiously scrupulous of bearing arms, shall be compelled to render military service, in person, upon paying an equivalent."

Mr. SHERMAN conceived it difficult to modify the clause and make it better. It is well known that those who are religiously scrupulous of bearing arms, are equally scrupulous of getting substitutes or paying an equivalent. Many of them would rather die than do either one or the other; but he did not see an absolute necessity for a clause of this kind. We do not live under an arbitrary Government, said he, and the States, respectively, will have the government of the militia, unless when called into actual service; besides, it would not do to alter it so as to exclude the whole of any sect, because there are men amongst the Quakers who will turn out, notwithstanding the religious principles of the society, and defend the cause of their country. Certainly it will be improper to prevent the exercise of such favorable dispositions, at least whilst it is the practice of nations to determine their contests by the slaughter of their citizens and subjects.

Mr. VINING hoped the clause would be suffered to remain as it stood, because he saw no use in it if it was amended so as to compel a man to find a substitute, which, with respect to the Government, was the same as if the person himself turned out to fight.

Mr. STONE inquired what the words "religiously scrupulous" had reference to: was it of bearing arms? If it was, it ought so to be expressed.

Mr. BENSON moved to have the words "but no person religiously scrupulous shall be compelled to bear arms," struck out. He would always leave it to the benevolence of the Legislature, for, modify it as you please, it will be impossible to express it in such a manner as to clear it from ambiguity. No man can claim this indulgence of right. It may be a religious persuasion, but it is no natural right, and therefore ought to be left to the discretion of the Government. If this stands part of the Constitution, it will be a question before the Judiciary on every regulation of the militia, with respect to the organization of the militia, whether it comports with this declaration or not. It is extremely injudicious to intermix matters of doubt with fundamentals.

I have no reason to believe but the Legislature will always possess humanity enough to indulge this class of citizens in a matter they are so desirous of; but they ought to be left to their discretion.

The motion for striking out the whole clause being seconded, was put, and decided in the negative—22 members voting for it, and 24 against it.

Mr. GERRY objected to the first part of the clause, on account of the uncertainty with which it is expressed. A well regulated militia being the best security of a free State, admitted an idea that a standing army was a secondary one. It ought to read, "a well regulated militia, trained to arms," in which case it would become the duty of the Government to provide this security, and furnish a greater certainty of its being done.

Mr. GERRY's motion not being seconded, the question was put on the clause as reported, which being adopted,

Mr. BENSON proposed to add to the clause just agreed to, an amendment to the following effect: "A standing army of regular troops in time of peace is dangerous to public liberty, and such shall not be raised or kept up in time of peace, but from necessity, and for the security of the people, nor then without the consent of two-thirds of the members present of both Houses; and in all cases the military shall be subordinate to the civil authority." This being seconded,

Mr. VINING asked whether this was to be considered as an addition to the last clause, or an amendment by itself. If the former, he would remind the gentleman the clause was decided; if the latter, it was improper to introduce new matter, as the House had referred the report specially to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BENSON feared that, what with being trammeled in rules, and the apparent disposition of the committee, he should not be able to get them to consider any amendment; he submitted to such proceeding because he could not help himself.

Mr. HARTLEY thought the amendment in order, and was ready to give his opinion on it. He hoped the people of America would always be satisfied with having a majority to govern. He never wished to see two-thirds or three-fourths required, because it might put it in the power of a small minority to govern the whole Union.

The question on Mr. BENSON's motion was put, and lost by a majority of thirteen.

The fourth clause of the fourth proposition was taken up as follows: "No soldier shall, in time of peace, be quartered in any house, without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law."

Mr. SUMTER hoped soldiers would never be quartered on the inhabitants, either in time of peace or war, without the consent of the owner. It was a burden, and very oppressive, even in cases where the owner gave his consent; but where this was wanting, it would be a hardship indeed! Their property would lie at the mercy of men irritated by a refusal, and well disposed to destroy the peace of the family.

He moved to strike out all the words from the clause but "no soldier shall be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner."

Mr. SHERMAN observed that it was absolutely necessary that marching troops should have quarters, whether in time of peace or war, and that it ought not to be put in the power of an individual to obstruct the public service; if quarters were not to be obtained in public barracks, they must be procured elsewhere. In England, where they paid considerable attention to private rights, they billeted the troops upon the keepers of public houses, and upon private houses also, with the consent of the magistracy.

Mr. SUMTER's motion being put, was lost by a majority of sixteen.

Mr. GERRY moved to insert between "but" and "in a manner," the words, "by a civil magistrate," observing that there was no part of the Union but where they could have access to such authority.

Mr. HARTLEY said those things ought to be entrusted to the Legislature; that cases might arise where the public safety would be endangered by putting it in the power of one person to keep a division of troops standing in the inclemency of the weather for many hours; therefore he was against inserting the words.

Mr. GERRY said either his amendment was essential, or the whole clause was unnecessary.

On putting the question, thirteen rose in favor of the motion, thirty-five against it; and then the clause was carried as reported.

Amendments to the Constitution.

The fifth clause of the fourth proposition was taken up, viz: "No person shall be subject, in cases of impeachment, to more than one trial or one punishment for the same offence, nor shall he be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

Mr. BENSON thought the committee could not agree to the amendment in the manner it stood, because its meaning appeared rather doubtful. It says that no person shall be tried more than once for the same offence. This is contrary to the right heretofore established; he presumed it was intended to express what was secured by our former Constitution, that no man's life should be more than once put in jeopardy for the same offence; yet it was well known, that they were entitled to more than one trial. The humane intention of the clause was to prevent more than one punishment; for which reason he would move to amend it by striking out the words "one trial or." Mr. SHERMAN approved of the motion. He said, that as the clause now stood, a person found guilty could not arrest the judgment, and obtain a second trial in his own favor. He thought that the courts of justice would never think of trying and punishing twice for the same offence. If the person was acquitted on the first trial, he ought not to be tried a second time; but if he was convicted on the first, and any thing should appear to set the judgment aside, he was entitled to a second, which was certainly favorable to him. Now the clause as it stands would deprive him of that advantage.

Mr. LIVERMORE thought the clause very essential; it was declaratory of the law as it now stood; striking out the words would seem as if they meant to change the law by implication, and expose a man to the danger of more than one trial. Many persons may be brought to trial for crimes they are guilty of, but for want of evidence may be acquitted; in such cases, it is the universal practice in Great Britain, and in this country, that persons shall not be brought to a second trial for the same offence; therefore the clause is proper as it stands.

Mr. SNOWICK thought, instead of securing the liberty of the subject, it would be abridging the privileges of those who were prosecuted.

The question on Mr. Benson's motion being put, was lost by a considerable majority.

Mr. PATTERSON moved to insert after "same offence," the words "by any law of the United States." This amendment was lost also.

Mr. LAWRENCE said this clause contained a general declaration, in some degree contrary to laws passed. He alluded to that part where a person shall not be compelled to give evidence against himself. He thought it ought to be confined to criminal cases, and moved an amendment for that purpose; which amendment being adopted, the clause as amended was unanimously agreed to by the committee, who then proceeded to the sixth clause of the fourth proposition, in these words, "Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted."

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, objected to the words "nor cruel and unusual punishments;" the import of them being too indefinite.

Mr. LIVERMORE.—The clause seems to express a great deal of humanity, on which account I have no objection to it; but as it seems to have no meaning in it, I do not think it necessary. What is meant by the terms excessive bail? Who are to be the judges? What is understood by excessive fines? It lies with the court to determine. No cruel and unusual punishment is to be inflicted; it is sometimes necessary to hang a man, having their ears cut off; but are we in future to be prevented from inflicting these punishments because they are cruel? If a more lenient mode of correcting vice and deterring others from the commission of it could be invented, it would be very prudent in the Legislature to adopt it; but until we have some security that this will be done, we ought not to be restrained from making necessary laws by any declaration of this kind.

The question was put on the clause, and it was agreed to by a considerable majority.

The committee went on to the consideration of the seventh clause of the fourth proposition, being as follows: "The right of the people to be secured in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, shall not be violated by warrants issuing without probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and not particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized."

Mr. GERRY said he presumed there was a mistake in the wording of this clause; it ought to be "the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable seizures and searches," and therefore moved that amendment.

This was adopted by the committee.

Mr. BENSON objected to the words "by warrants issuing." This declaratory provision was good as far as it went, but he thought it was not sufficient; he therefore proposed to alter it so as to read "and no warrant shall issue."

The question was put on this motion, and lost by a considerable majority.

Mr. LIVERMORE objected to the words "and not" between "affirmation" and "particularly." He moved to strike them out, in order to make it an affirmative proposition.

But the motion passed in the negative.

The clause as amended being now agreed to,

The eighth clause of the fourth proposition was taken up, which was "The enumeration in this Constitution of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people."

Mr. GERRY said, it ought to be "deny or impair," for the word "disparage" was not of plain import; he therefore moved to make that alteration, but not being seconded, the question was taken on the clause, and it passed in the affirmative.

The committee then proceeded to the fifth proposition:

Article 1, section 10, between the first and second paragraph, insert "no State shall infringe the equal rights of conscience, nor the freedom of speech, or of the press, nor of the right of trial by jury in criminal cases."

Mr. TUCKER.—This is offered, I presume, as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, but it goes only to the alteration of the constitutions of particular States. It will be much better, I apprehend, to leave the State Governments to themselves, and not to interfere with them more than we already do; and that is thought by many to be rather too much. I therefore move, sir, to strike out these words.

Mr. MANISON conceived this to be the most valuable amendment in the whole list. If there were any reason to restrain the Government of the United States from infringing upon these essential rights, it was equally necessary that they should be secured against the State Governments. He thought that if they provided against the one, it was as necessary to provide against the other, and was satisfied that it would be equally grateful to the people.

Mr. LIVERMORE had no great objection to the sentiment, but he thought it not well expressed. He wished to make it an affirmative proposition; "the equal rights of conscience, the freedom of speech or of the press, and the right of trial by jury in criminal cases, shall not be infringed by any State."

This transposition being agreed to, and Mr. TUCKER's motion being rejected, the clause was adopted.

The sixth proposition, article 3, section 2, add to the second paragraph, "But no appeal to such court shall be allowed, where the value in controversy shall not amount to one thousand dollars; nor shall any fact, triable by a jury according to the course of the common law, be otherwise re-examinable than according to the rules of the common law."

Mr. BENSON moved to strike out the first part of the paragraph respecting the limitation of appeals, because the question in controversy might be an important one, though the action was not to the amount of a thousand dollars.

Mr. MANISON.—If the gentleman will propose any restriction to answer his purpose, and for avoiding the inconvenience he apprehends, I am willing to agree to it; but it will be improper to strike out the clause without a substitute.

There is little danger that any court in the United States will admit an appeal where the matter in dispute does not amount to a thousand dollars; but as the possibility of such an event has excited in the minds of many citizens the greatest apprehension that persons of opulence would carry a cause from the extremities of the Union to the Supreme Court, and thereby prevent the due administration of justice, it ought to be guarded against.

Mr. LIVERMORE thought the clause was objectionable, because it comprehended nothing more than the value.

Mr. SNOWICK moved to insert three thousand dollars instead of one thousand; but on the question, this motion was rejected, and the proposition accepted in its original form.

The committee then proceeded to consider the seventh proposition, in the words following:

Article 3, section 2. Strike out the whole of the third paragraph, and insert, "In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, to be confronted with the witnesses against him, to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence."

Mr. BURS moved to amend this proposition in such a manner as to leave it in the power of the accused to put off the trial to the next session, provided he made it appear to the court that the evidence of the witnesses, for whom process was granted but not served, was material to his defence.

Mr. HARTLEY said, that in securing him the right of compulsory process, the Government did all it could; the remainder must lie in the discretion of the court.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, thought the regulation would come properly in, as part of the judicial system.

The question on Mr. BURS's motion was taken and lost; ayes 9, noes 41.

Mr. LIVERMORE moved to alter the clause, so as to secure to the criminal the right of being tried in the State where the offence was committed.

Mr. STONE observed that full provision was made on the subject in the subsequent clause.

On the question, Mr. LIVERMORE's motion was adopted.

Mr. BURS said, he was not so much discouraged by the fate of his former motions, but that he would venture upon another. He therefore proposed to add to the clause, "that no criminal prosecution should be had by way of information."

Mr. HARTLEY only requested the gentleman to look to the clause, and he would see the propriety of inserting it in this place.

A desultory conversation arose, respecting the foregoing motion, and after some time, Mr. BURS withdrew it for the present.

The committee then rose and reported progress, after which the House adjourned.

NEW JERSEY ELECTIONS.

Mr. CLYMER, from the Committee of Elections, reported that the committee, pursuant to the instructions to them contained in the resolution of the twenty-fifth of May, relative to the petition of a number of the citizens of the State of New Jersey, complaining of the illegality of the election of the members of this House, as elected within that State, do ascertain the following facts, as arising from the proofs, to wit:

1st. That the election for members of this House, held within that State, in consequence of an act of the Legislature thereof, entitled "An act for carrying into effect, on the part of the State of New Jersey, the Constitution of the United States, assented to, ratified, and confirmed by this State, on the 18th day of December, 1787," passed the 30th November, 1781, were closed in the several counties of Bergen, Morris, Monmouth, Hunterdon, Somerset, Middlesex, Sussex, Salem, Cape May, Cumberland, Burlington, and Gloucester, and the lists of the several persons voted for, and the number of votes taken for each, were received by the Governor at the respective times appearing from the said lists, and the endorsements thereon, which lists accompany this report.

2d. That the election in the county of Essex, the remaining county in the State, closed on the 27th of April, and the list was received by the Governor on the 2d of May.

3d. That in consequence of the summons from the Governor, (a copy whereof accompanied this report,) dated the 27th of February, to four of the members of the council, a privy council, consisting of the Governor and the four members so summoned, did assemble at Elizabethtown on the 3d of March, and, being so assembled, Mr. Haring, another member of the council, received a note from the Governor, (a copy whereof accompanies this report,) in consequence whereof Mr. Haring did also attend the privy council as a member thereof.

4th. That the Governor then appointed another meeting of the privy council, to be held on the 18th of March, on which day the Governor and eleven members of the council did assemble, and did then determine, from the lists of the twelve counties specified in the first fact above stated, the four persons now holding seats in this House, the four persons elected members of this House within that State; against which determination of the council, three of the members then present did protest; and a protest (a copy of which accompanies this report) was, with the consent of the council, delivered into the council in form, on the subsequent day.

5th. That there was no determination of the Governor and privy council in the premises, until the eighteenth of March.

6th. That the Governor did, on the nineteenth of March, issue a proclamation, (a copy whereof accompanies this report.)

Ordered, That the said report do lie on the table.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. GERRY moved,

"That such of the amendments to the Constitution proposed by the several States, as are not in substance comprised in the report of the select committee appointed to consider amendments, be referred to a Committee of the whole House; and that all amendments which shall be agreed to by the committee last mentioned be included in one report."

Mr. TUCKER remarked, that many citizens expected that the amendments proposed by the conventions would be attended to by the House, and that several members conceived it to be their duty to bring them forward. If the House should decline taking them into consideration, it might tend to destroy that harmony which had hitherto existed, and which did great honor to their proceedings; it might affect all their future measures, and promote such feuds as might embarrass the Government exceedingly. The States who had proposed these amendments would feel some degree of chagrin at having misplaced their confidence in the General Government. Five important States have pretty plainly expressed their apprehensions of the danger to which the rights of their citizens are exposed. Finding these cannot be secured in the mode they had wished, they will naturally recur to the alternative, and endeavor to obtain a Federal Convention; the consequence of this may be disagreeable to the Union; party spirit may be revived, and animosities rekindled destructive of tranquility. States that exert themselves to obtain a Federal Convention, and those that oppose the measure, may feel so strongly the spirit of discord, as to sever the Union asunder.

If in this conflict the advocates for a Federal convention should prove successful, the consequences may be alarming; we may lose many of the valuable principles now established in the present Constitution. If, on the other hand, a convention should not be obtained, the consequences resulting are equally to be dreaded; it would render the administration of this system of government weak, if not impracticable; for no Government can be administered with energy, however energetic its system, unless it obtains the confidence and support of the people. Which of the two evils is the greatest would be difficult to ascertain.

It is essential to our deliberations that the harmony of the House be preserved; by it alone we shall be enabled to perfect the organization of the Government—a Government but in embryo, or at best but in its infancy.

My idea relative to this Constitution, whilst it was dependent upon the assent of the several States, was, that it required amendment, and that the proper time for amendment was previous to the ratification. My reasons were, that I conceived it difficult, if not impossible, to obtain essential amendments by the way pointed out in the Constitution; nor have I been mistaken in this suspicion. It will be found, I fear, still more difficult than I apprehended; for, perhaps, these amendments, should they be agreed to by two-thirds of both Houses of Congress, will be submitted for ratification to the Legislatures of the several States, instead of State conventions, in which case the chance is still worse. The Legislatures of almost all the States consist of two independent, distinct bodies; the amendments must be adopted by three-fourths of such Legislatures; that is to say, they must meet the approbation of the majority of each of eighteen deliberative assemblies. But, notwithstanding all these objections to obtaining amendments after the ratification of the Constitution, it will tend to give a great degree of satisfaction to those who are desirous of them, if this House shall take them up, and consider them with that degree of candor and attention they have hitherto displayed on the subjects that have come before them; consider the amendments separately, and, after fair deliberation, either approve or disapprove of them. By such conduct, we answer in some degree the expectations of those citizens in the several States who have shown so great a tenacity to the preservation of those rights and liberties they secured to themselves by an arduous, persevering, and successful conflict.

I have hopes that the States will be reconciled to this disappointment, in consequence of such procedure.

A great variety of arguments might be urged in favor of the motion; but I shall rest it here, and not trespass any further upon the patience of the House.

Mr. MADISON was just going to move to refer these amendments, in order that they might be considered in the fullest manner; but it would be very inconvenient to have them made up into one report, or all of them discussed at the present time.

Mr. VINING had no objection to the bringing them forward in the fullest point of view; but his objection arose from the informality attending the introduction of the business.

The order of the House was to refer the report of the Committee of Eleven to a Committee of the Whole, and therefore it was improper to propose any thing additional.

A desultory conversation arose on this motion, when Mr. VINING moved the previous question, in which, being supported by five members, it was put, and the question was, Shall the main question, to agree to the motion, be now put? The yeas and nays being demanded by one-fifth of the members present, on this last motion, they were taken as follows:

YEA—Messrs. Burke, Cotes, Floyd, Gerry, Griffin, Grout, Hathorn, Livermore, Page, Parker, Van Rensselaer, Sherman, Stone, Sturgis, Sumter, and Tucker—16.

NAY—Messrs. Ames, Baldwin, Benson, Boudinot, Brown, Cadwalader, Carroll, Clymer, Fitzsimons, Foster, Gilman, Goodhue, Hartley, Heister, Huntington, Lawrence, Lee, Madison, Moore, Muhlenburg, Partridge, Schureman, Scott, Sedgwick, Soney, Sylvester, Sinnickson, Smith of Maryland, Smith of South Carolina, Thatcher, Trumbull, Vining, Wadsworth, and Wynkoop—34.

So the motion was lost.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate had passed the bill providing for expenses which may attend negotiations or treaties with the Indian tribes, and the appointment of commissioners for managing the same, with an amendment, to which they desire the concurrence of the House.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the subject of amendment, and took into consideration the 2d clause of the 7th proposition, in the words following, "The trial of all crimes (except in cases of impeachment, and in cases arising in the land and naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service in the time of war, or public danger,) shall be by an impartial jury of freeholders of the vicinage, with the requisite of unanimity for conviction, the right of challenge, and other accustomed requisites; and no person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment, or indictment, by a grand jury; but if a crime be committed in a place in the possession of an enemy, or in which an insurrection may prevail, the indictment and trial may by law be authorized in some other place within the same State; and if it be committed in a place not within a State, the indictment and trial may be at such place or places as the law may have directed."

Mr. BURKE moved to change the word "vicinage" into "district or county in which the offence has been committed." He said this was conformable to the practice of the State of South Carolina, and he believed to most of the States in the Union; it would have a tendency also to quiet the alarm entertained by the good citizens of many of the States for their personal security; they would no longer fear being dragged from one extremity of the State to the other for trial, at the distance of three or four hundred miles.

Mr. LEE thought the word "vicinage," was more applicable than that of "district or county;" it being a term well understood by every gentleman of legal knowledge.

The question on Mr. BURKE's motion being put was negatived.

Mr. BURKE then revived his motion for preventing prosecutions upon information, but on the question this was also lost.

The clause was now adopted without amendment.

The 3d clause of the 7th proposition, as follows, "In suits at common law, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved," was considered and adopted.

The 8th proposition in the words following was considered, "Immediately after article 6, the following to be inserted as article 7:"

"The powers delegated by this Constitution to the Government of the United States, shall be exercised as therein appropriated, so that the Legislative shall not exercise the powers vested in the Executive or Judicial; nor the Executive the power vested in the Legislative or Judicial; nor the Judicial the powers vested in the Legislative or Executive."

Mr. SHERMAN conceived this amendment to be altogether unnecessary, inasmuch as the Constitution assigned the business of each branch of the Government to a separate department.

Mr. MADISON supposed the people would be gratified with the amendment, as it was admitted that the powers ought to be separate and distinct; it might also tend to an explanation of some doubts that might arise respecting the construction of the Constitution.

Mr. LIVERMORE, thinking the clause subversive of the Constitution, was opposed to it, and hoped it might be disagreed to.

On the motion being put, the proposition was carried.

The 9th proposition, in the words following, was considered, "The powers not delegated by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively."

Mr. TUCKER proposed to amend the proposition, by prefixing to it "all powers being derived from the people." He thought this a better place to make this assertion than the introductory clause of the Constitution, where a similar sentiment was proposed by the committee. He extended his motion also, to add the word "expressly," so as to read "the powers not expressly delegated by this Constitution."

Mr. MADISON objected to this amendment, because it was impossible to confine a Government to the exercise of express powers; there must necessarily be admitted powers by implication, unless the Constitution descended to recollect every minutiae. He remembered the word "expressly," had been moved in the convention of Virginia, by the opponents to the ratification, and, after full and fair discussion, was given up by them, and the system allowed to retain its present form.

Mr. SHERMAN coincided with Mr. MADISON in opinion, observing that corporate bodies are supposed to possess all powers incident to a corporate capacity, without being absolutely expressed.

Mr. TUCKER did not view the word "expressly" in the same light with the gentleman who opposed him; he thought every power to be expressly given that could be clearly comprehended within any accurate definition of the general power.

Mr. TUCKER's motion being negatived,

Mr. CARROLL proposed to add to the end of the proposition, "or to the people;" this was agreed to.

The 10th proposition, "Article 7 to be made Article 8," agreed to.

The committee then rose, and reported the amendments as amended by the committee.

Mr. TUCKER then moved that the following propositions of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, be referred to a Committee of the whole House, to wit:

Art. 1. Sec. 2. Clause 2. At the end add these words: "Nor shall any person be capable of serving as a Representative more than six years in any term of eight years."

Clause 3. At the end, add these words, "From and after the commencement of the year 1795, the election of Senators for each State shall be annual, and no person shall be capable of serving as a Senator more than five years in any term of six years."

Sec. 4. Clause 1. Strike out the words, "Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

Sec. 5. Clause 1. Amend the first part to read thus, "Each State shall be the judge (according to its own laws) of the election of its Senators and Representatives to sit in Congress, and shall furnish them with sufficient credentials; but each House shall judge of the qualification of its own members: a majority of each House shall constitute," &c.

Clause 2. Strike out these words, "And with the concurrence of two-thirds expel a member," and insert the word "and" after the word "proceedings."

Sec. 6. Clause 2. Amend to read thus: "No person having been elected, and having taken his seat as a Senator or Representative, shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, and no person," &c.

Art. 1. Sec. 8. Clause 1. At the end, add these words: "No direct tax shall be laid, unless any State shall have neglected to furnish, in due time, its proportion of a previous requisition; in which case Congress may proceed to levy, by direct taxation, within any State so neglecting, its proportion of such requisition, together with interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, from the time it ought to have been furnished, and the charges of levying the same."

Clause 9. Strike out the words "tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court," and insert the words "courts of admiralty."

Clause 17. At the end, add these words: "Provided that the Congress shall not have authority to make any law to prevent the laws of the States, respectively, in which such district or places may be, from extending to such district or places in all civil and criminal matters, in which any person without the limits of such district or places shall be a party aggrieved."

Sec. 9. Clause 7. Strike out the words "Without the consent of the Congress," and amend to read thus: "Shall accept of any present or emolument, or hold any office or title of any kind whatever, from any king, prince, or foreign State; provided that this clause shall not be construed to affect the rights of those persons (during their own lives) who are now citizens of the United States, and hold foreign titles."

Sec. 10. Clause 2. Amend the first sentence to read thus: "No State shall lay any duties on imports or exports, or any duty of tonnage, except such as shall be uniform in their operation on all foreign nations, and consistent with their existing treaties, and also uniform in their operation on the citizens of all the several States in the Union."

Art. 2. Sec. 1. Clause 5. At the end, add these words: "Nor shall any person be capable of holding the office of President of the United States more than eight years in any term of twelve years."

Sec. 2. Clause 1. Strike out the words "he commander-in-chief," and insert, "have power to direct (agreeably to law) the operations."

Clause 3. At the end, add these words: "He shall also have power to suspend from his office, for a time not exceeding twelve months, any officer whom he shall have reason to think unfit to be entrusted with the duties thereof; and Congress may, by law, provide for the absolute removal of officers found to be unfit for the trust reposed in them."

Art. 3. Sec. 1. From each sentence strike out the words "inferior courts," and insert the words "courts of admiralty."

Sec. 2. Clause 1. Strike out the words "between a State and citizens of another State, &c. to the end, and amend to read thus: "between a State and foreign States, and between citizens of the United States claiming the same lands under grants of different States."

Art. 6. Clause 3. Between the word "no" and the word "religious," insert the word "other."

On the question, "Shall the said propositions of amendments be referred to the consideration of a Committee of the whole House?" it was determined in the negative.

WEDNESDAY, August 19.

INDIAN TREATIES.

The House took up the amendment of the Senate to the bill providing for the expense of Indian treaties. The alteration proposed by them was to insert twenty thousand dollars instead of forty thousand.

Mr. BALDWIN.—Whether the treaty with the Wabash nation is to be included in the provision as reduced by the Senate, or not, is a matter as yet undetermined. If it is, according to the account given by the Governor of the Western Territory, of the actual expenses attending treaties at which he had been present, I conceive the sum to be considerably short of what will be absolutely requisite to ensure the object which the House appears to have had in contemplation. I therefore move to amend the amendment by adopting these words: "for holding treaties with the Indians south of the Ohio."

Mr. SHERMAN.—I have been informed that the late Congress granted forty thousand dollars for the purpose of holding treaties with the Indians, and that sum has not yet been expended; and I conjecture that it has been information of a similar kind which has induced the Senate to propose this amendment.

Mr. HARTLEY thought it would be proper that the President should have a discretionary power on this occasion. If the forty thousand dollars spoken of remain yet unemployed, perhaps it may be sufficient, when added to what is granted by the present bill; but it would be prudent to ascertain the fact before the House decided.

Mr. FITZSIMONS observed that it was but last week the House had voted the forty thousand dollars. He should be glad to know upon what principle it was done; if they were wrong, they should at least be convinced of their error before they rescinded their former determination.

He presumed that the appropriation spoken of was not founded upon official communications, he therefore was at liberty to doubt its accuracy. He did not doubt that the former Congress had made demands upon particular States for that sum; but he questioned if they had been complied with, and very little reliance was to be had upon new advances from those quarters. However, be this as it might, he should be glad to know upon what ground the amendment stood; if he found it to be proper, he should cheerfully agree to it. He moved to let the bill lie on the table till tomorrow.

Mr. SENECWICK said that when this business was before under consideration, he was surprised to find the majority of the House in favor of the sum then moved for. It appeared to him that the President, in his message, had in contemplation a treaty with the Creek Indians only; and that they should exceed the sum necessary for that purpose, without having a previous estimate, appeared to him totally incomprehensible; that they should vote so large a sum of money at this period of the Government, and when the situation of our finances is so much embarrassed as to render it impossible to make any provision for the public creditors, would appear to be a most extraordinary appropriation. It very seldom occurs that a Government errs on the side of economy; the sum proposed in the amendment, he thought, would be amply sufficient; and if the largest sum was to be voted, they might be justifiable in supposing that the business would be protracted until the whole sum was expended. He therefore hoped the House would concur with the Senate.

Mr. SUMTER thought twenty thousand dollars fully competent to answer the present purpose.

Mr. MADISON controverted the sentiment of the honorable member from Massachusetts, (Mr. SENECWICK,) as it respected the errors of economy; he doubted the assertion that Government might not exceed in the practice of it; and he was not certain that it would not eventually appear in the present instance, that by too great caution not to exceed in the grant, they incurred an unnecessary additional expense. He seconded Mr. FITZSIMONS' motion to defer the decision until tomorrow.

Mr. BOURNIE opposed the motion. He entertained an opinion from which he did not mean to deviate, that in all appropriations we ought to have a special regard to the state of our Treasury. Can any estimate be produced to demonstrate that so large a sum as forty thousand dollars is necessary for this business? I presume not. The number of Indians to be provided for exceeds greatly what would be sufficient to give the treaties all possible validity. He was fully convinced by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. SUMTER,) in a former discussion on the same subject, that so large a sum was quite unnecessary upon the present occasion; we ought to consider that such large grants may influence future appropriations. Should the sum mentioned in the amendment be found insufficient, the President will give us notice accordingly, and the deficiency may be supplied. But should we appropriate a sum more than sufficient in the present state of our treasury, we shall find that we subject ourselves to very great embarrassments, and cannot justify such a step. He was of opinion that twenty thousand dollars would be found fully sufficient, with what was now on hand, and he hoped the motion for postponing would not be agreed to. The time fixed for holding the treaty is fast approaching. Should the warriors appear on the ground, without finding our commissioners, they would return home, and then what would be the consequence? The loss of a single day might be attended with fatal effects.

Mr. LAWRENCE was in favor of postponing the motion; he wished to obtain accurate information respecting several circumstances that had been mentioned; time must be allowed for this; and the House by to-morrow may be in the possession of such facts as will enable them to act more clearly on the business. I trust, sir, said he that I am as averse as any member in this House to the making use of the public money, either profusely or unnecessarily. But this is an important subject; and the making of such provisions as may fully answer the object in the first instance is the most likely mode to ensure a satisfactory fulfillment.

On the motion being put for postponement of the bill, it was negatived.

Mr. BALDWIN moved to insert the words "south of the Ohio."

Mr. SCOTT.—It may, perhaps, be thought something odd, Mr. Chairman, that living upon the frontiers, and being supposed to know something of Indian affairs, I should be silent on this occasion; the reason is, sir, that I have no opinion of Indian treaties, as Indian treaties are usually conducted; and I fear, if any sum is voted more than sufficient to support the commissioners, and feed the Indians while the treaty lasts, that it will be embezzled; for I conceive it to be the worst kind of policy to spend a large sum of money in making presents to the savages; it never was productive of any solid advantage, but frequently the reverse. The Indians have reduced war and treaties to a system of commerce and traffic. By giving them presents, we strengthen and enable them to fall upon our defenceless frontiers. It has often been the case that the arms and ammunition, which they have received at a treaty of peace, have been made use of against the donors. I conceive the sum of twenty thousand dollars to be quite sufficient, and hope we shall concur with the Senate therein.

Mr. MOORE acquiesced with Mr. SCOTT. The system which had been adhered to of making presents to the Indians he highly reprobated.

Mr. BALDWIN observed, that the observations of the honorable gentleman (Mr. SCOTT) are of a general nature; a statement had been made by the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, and by the Secretary of War, and was supposed to be upon the best information they could obtain; if this should prove defective, or if it be too much, let the particulars be pointed out in which the excess lies. He states, in his estimate, that twenty-five thousand dollars are requisite for holding treaties with the Southern tribes. If it is intended by this provision that the expenses of holding treaties with both Northern and Southern tribes should be defrayed, it plainly appears that we shall fail for want of means to effect our object on both.

Mr. SUMTER.—The number of Indians on which the estimate is founded arose merely from misinformation; so large a number does not appear to be necessary; such a quantity will not be assembled; there cannot be provision made for them; they would run the risk of suffering exceedingly. I do not entertain a doubt, sir, but the business may be properly conducted without assembling such a number, and I dare assert it will be well done if we do not make too large a provision. We shall, I hope, support the dignity of the United States, and let those Indians know that treaties in future shall not be violated by them with impunity.

ity; that we will treat with them upon generous and reciprocal terms; that while we protect them from any depredations from our frontiers, they shall strictly adhere to the stipulations on their part. Some trifling presents, I grant, may be necessary; it is an ancient custom; but I am opposed to extravagant or profuse ones, because they are dollars. I think the sum of twenty thousand dollars will be fully sufficient.

The motion of Mr. BALDWIN being put, was negatived; after which the amendment of the Senate was agreed to.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The House then took into consideration the amendments to the Constitution, as reported by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SHERMAN renewed his motion for adding the amendments to the Constitution by way of supplement.

Hereupon ensued a debate similar to what took place in the Committee of the Whole, (see page 707;) but, on the question, Mr. SHERMAN's motion was carried by two-thirds of the House; in consequence it was agreed to.

The first proposition of amendment (see page 707) was rejected, because two-thirds of the members present did not support it.

Mr. AMES then brought forward his motion respecting the representation suggested, (see page 728.) A desultory conversation took place, and several amendments of the motion were attempted; but the House adjourned without coming to any determination.

THURSDAY, August 20.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they agree to the resolution of this House of the 10th instant, for executing the survey directed by an act of the late Congress, of June 6, 1788.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole on the subject of amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. AMES's proposition was taken up. Five or six other members introduced propositions on the same point, and the whole were, by mutual consent, laid on the table. After which, the House proceeded to the third amendment, and agreed to the same.

On motion of Mr. AMES, the fourth amendment was altered so as to read "Congress shall make no law establishing religion, or to prevent the free exercise thereof, or to infringe the rights of conscience." This being adopted,

The first proposition was agreed to. Mr. SCOTT objected to the clause in the sixth amendment, "No person religiously scrupulous shall be compelled to bear arms." He observed that if this becomes part of the Constitution, such persons can neither be called upon for their services, nor can an equivalent be demanded; it is also attended with still further difficulties, for a militia can never be depended upon. This would lead to the violation of another article in the Constitution, which secures to the people the right of keeping arms, and in this case recourse must be had to a standing army. I conceive it, said he, to be a Legislative right altogether. There are many sects I know, who are religiously scrupulous in this respect; I do not mean to deprive them of any indulgence the law affords; my design is to guard against those who are of no religion. It has been urged that religion is on the decline; if so, the argument is more strong in my favor, for when the time comes that religion shall be discarded, the generality of persons will have recourse to these pretenses to get excused from bearing arms.

Mr. BOUNDINOT thought the provision in the clause, or something similar to it, was necessary. Can any dependence, said he, be placed in men who are conscientious in this respect? or what justice can there be in compelling them to bear arms, when, according to their religious principles, they would rather die than use them? He adverted to several instances of oppression on this point, that occurred during the war. In forming a militia, an effectual defence ought to be calculated, and no characters of this religious description ought to be compelled to take up arms. I hope that in establishing this Government, we may show the world that proper care is taken that the Government may not interfere with the religious sentiments of any person. Now, by striking out the clause, people may be led to believe that there is an intention in the General Government to compel all its citizens to bear arms.

Some further desultory conversation arose, and it was agreed to insert the words "in person," to the end of the clause; after which, it was adopted, as was the fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth clauses of the fourth proposition; then the fifth, sixth, and seventh propositions were agreed to, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, August 21.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The House proceeded in the consideration of the amendments to the Constitution reported by the Committee of the Whole, and took up the second clause of the fourth proposition.

Mr. GERRY then proposed to amend it by striking out these words, "public danger," and to insert "foreign invasion," this being negatived, it was then moved to strike out the last clause, "and if it be committed," &c. to the end. This motion was carried, and the amendment was adopted.

The House then took into consideration the third clause of the seventh proposition, which was adopted without debate.

The eighth proposition was agreed to in the same manner.

The ninth proposition Mr. GERRY proposed to amend by inserting the word "expressly," so as to read "the powers not expressly delegated by the Constitution, nor prohibited to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." As he thought this an amendment of great importance, he requested the yeas and nays might be taken. He was supported in this by one-fifth of the members present; whereupon they were taken, and were as follows:

Yeas.—Messrs. Burke, Coles, Floyd, Groat, Hathorn, Jackson, Livermore, Page, Parker, Partridge, Van Rensselaer, Smith, (of South Carolina,) Stone, Sumter, Thatcher, and Tucker—17.

Nays.—Messrs. Ames, Benson, Boudinot, Brown, Cadwalader, Carroll, Clymer, Fitzsimons, Foster, Gale, Gilman, Goodhue, Hartley, Heister, Lawrence, Lee, Madison, Moore, Muhlenburg, Schureman, Scott, Sedgwick, Seney, Sherman, Sylvester, Sunnicksen, Smith, (of Maryland,) Sturges, Trumbull, Vining, Wedgworth, and Wynkoop—32.

Mr. SHERMAN moved to alter the last clause, so as to make it read, "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

This motion was adopted without debate.

Mr. BURKE.—The majority of this House may be inclined to think all our propositions unimportant, as they seemed to consider that upon which the yeas and nays were just now called. However, to the minority they are important; and it will be happy for the Government, if the majority of our citizens are not of their opinion; but be this as it may, I move you, sir, to add to the articles of amendment the following: "Congress shall not alter, modify, or interfere in the times, places, or manner of holding elections of Senators, or Representatives, except when any State shall refuse or neglect, or be unable, by invasion or rebellion, to make such election."

Mr. AMES thought this one of the most justifiable of all the powers of Congress; it was essential to a body representing the whole community, that they should have power to regulate their own elections, in order to secure a representation from every part, and prevent any improper regulations, calculated to answer party purposes only. It is a solecism in politics to let others judge for them, and is a departure from the principles upon which the Constitution was founded.

Mr. LIVERMORE said, this was an important amendment, and one that had caused more debate in the Convention of New Hampshire than any other whatever. The gentleman just up said it was a solecism in politics, but he could cite an instance in which it had taken place. He only called upon gentlemen to recollect the circumstance of Mr. SMITH's (of South Carolina) election, and to ask if that was not decided by the State laws? Was not his qualification as a member of the Federal Legislature determined upon the laws of South Carolina? It was not supported by the people of South Carolina, that the House would question a right derived by their representative from their authority.

Mr. MANISON.—If this amendment had been proposed at any time either in the Committee of the Whole or separately in the House, I should not have objected to the discussion of it. But I cannot agree to delay the amendments now agreed upon, by entering into the consideration of propositions not likely to obtain the consent of either two-thirds of this House or three-fourths of the State Legislatures. I have considered this subject with some degree of attention, and, upon the whole, am inclined to think the Constitution stands very well as it is.

Mr. GERRY was sorry that gentlemen objected to the time and manner of introducing this amendment, because it was too important in its nature to be defeated by want of form. He hoped, and he understood it to be the sense of the House, that each amendment should stand upon its own ground; if this was, therefore, examined on its own merits, it might stand or fall as it deserved, and there would be no cause of complaint on the score of inattention.

His colleague (Mr. AMES) objected to the amendment, because he thought no Legislature was without the power of determining the mode of its own appointment; but he would find, if he turned to the constitution of the State he was a representative of, that the times, places, and manner of choosing members of their Senate and Council were prescribed therein.

Why, said he, are gentlemen desirous of retaining this power? Is it because it gives energy to the Government? It certainly has no such tendency; then why retain a clause so obnoxious to almost every State? But this provision may be necessary in order to establish a Government of an arbitrary kind, to which the present system is pointed in no very indirect manner: in this way, indeed, it may be useful. If the United States are desirous of controlling the elections of the people, they will, in the first place, by virtue of the powers given them by the 4th sect. of the 1st art., abolish the mode of balloting; then every person must publicly announce his vote, and it would then frequently happen that he would be obliged to vote for a man, or "the friend of a man," to whom he was under obligations. If the Government grows desirous of being arbitrary elections will be ordered at remote places, where their friends alone will attend. Gentlemen will tell me that these things are not to be apprehended; but if they say that the Government has the power of doing them, they have no right to say the Government will never exercise such powers, because it is presumable that they will administer the Constitution at one time or another with all its powers; and whenever that time arrives, farewell to the rights of the people, even to elect their own representatives.

Mr. STONE called upon gentlemen to show what confederated Government had the power of determining on the mode of their own election. He apprehended there were none; for the representatives of States were chosen by the States in the manner they pleased. He was not afraid that the General Government would abuse this power, and as little afraid that the States would; but he thought it was in the order of things that the power should vest in the States respectively, because they can vary their regulations to accommodate the people in a more convenient manner than can be done in any general law whatever. He thought the amendment was generally expected, and therefore, on the principles of the majority, ought to be adopted.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said he hoped it would be agreed to; that eight States had expressed their desires on this head, and all of them wished the General Government to relinquish their control over the elections. The eight States he alluded to were New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina.

Mr. CARROLL denied that Maryland had expressed the desire attributed to her.

Mr. FITZSIMMONS.—The remark was not just as it respected Pennsylvania.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said the Convention of Maryland appointed a committee to recommend amendments, and among them was the one now under consideration.

Mr. STONE replied there was nothing of the kind noticed on the journals of that body.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, did not know how they came into the world, but he had certainly seen them. As to Pennsylvania, there was a very considerable minority, he understood one-third, who had recommended the amendment. Now, taking all circumstances into consideration, it might be fairly inferred that a majority of the United States were in favor of this amendment. He had studied to make himself acquainted with this particular subject, and all that he had ever heard in defence of the power being exercised by the General Government was, that it was necessary, in case any State neglected, or refused to make provision for the election. Now these cases were particularly excepted by the clause proposed by his honorable colleague, and therefore he presumed there was no good argument against it.

Mr. SEDGWICK moved to amend the motion, by giving the power to Congress to alter the times, manner, and places of holding elections, provided the States made improper ones; for as much injury might result to the Union from improper regulations, as from a neglect or refusal to make any. It is as much to be apprehended that the States may abuse their powers, as that the United States may make an improper use of theirs.

Mr. AMES said that inadequate regulations were equally injurious as having none, and that such an amendment as was now proposed would alter the Constitution: it would vest the supreme authority in places where it was never contemplated.

Mr. SHERMAN observed that the Convention were very unanimous in passing this clause; that it was an important provision, and if it was resigned, it would tend to subvert the Government. Mr. MADISON was willing to make every amendment that was required by the States, which did not tend to destroy the principles and the efficacy of the Constitution; he conceived that the proposed amendment would have that tendency, he was therefore opposed to it.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, observed that the States had the sole regulation of elections, so far as it respected the President. Now he saw no good reason why they should be indulged in this, and prohibited from the other. But the amendment did not go so far; it admitted that the General Government might interfere whenever the State Legislature refused or neglected; and it might happen that the business would be neglected without any design to injure the administration of the General Government; it might be that the two branches of the Legislature could not agree, as happened, he believed, in the Legislature of New York, with respect to their choice of Senators at their late session.

Mr. TUCKER objected to Mr. SEDGWICK's motion of amendment, because it had a tendency to defeat the object of the proposition brought forward by his colleague, (Mr. BURKE.) The General Government would be the judge of inadequate or improper regulations: of consequence, they might interfere in any or every law which the States might pass on that subject.

He wished that the State Legislatures might be left to themselves to perform every thing they were competent to, without the guidance of Congress. He believed there was no great danger, but they knew how to pursue their own good, as well when left to their discretion, as they would under the direction of a superior. It seemed to him as if there was a strong propensity in this Government to take upon themselves the guidance of the State Governments, which to his mind implied a doubt of their capacity to govern themselves; now, his judgment was convinced that the particular State Governments could take care of themselves, and deserved more to be trusted than this did, because the right of the citizen was more secure under it.

It had been supposed by some States, that electing by districts was the most convenient mode of choosing members to this House; others have thought that the whole State ought to vote for the whole number of members to be elected for that State. Congress might, under like impressions, set their regulations aside. He had heard that many citizens of Virginia (which State was divided into eleven districts) supposed themselves abridged of nine-tenths of their privilege by being restrained to the choice of one man instead of ten, the number that State sends to this House.

With respect to the election of Senators, the mode is fixed; every State but New York has established a precedent; there is, therefore, but little danger of any difficulty on this account. As to New York, she suffers by her want of decision; it is her own loss; but probably they may soon decide the point, and then no difficulty can possibly arise hereafter. From all these considerations, he was induced to hope Mr. SEDGWICK's motion would be negatived, and his colleague's agreed to.

Mr. GOUGH hoped the amendment never would obtain. Gentlemen should recollect there appeared a large majority against amendments, when the subject was first introduced, and he had no doubt but that majority still existed. Now, rather than this amendment should take effect, he would vote against all that had been agreed to.

His greatest apprehensions were, that the State Governments would oppose and thwart the general one to such a degree as finally to overturn it. Now, to guard against this evil, he wished the Federal Government to possess every power necessary to its existence.

Mr. BURKE was convinced there was a majority against him; but, nevertheless, he would do his duty, and propose such amendments as he conceived essential to secure the rights and liberties of his constituents. He begged permission to make an observation or two, not strictly in order; the first was on an assertion that had been repeated more than once in this House, "That this revolution, or adoption of the new Constitution, was agreeable to the public mind, and those who opposed it at first, are now satisfied with it." I believe, sir, said he, that many of those gentlemen who agreed to the ratification without amendments, did it from principles of patriotism, but they knew at the same time that they parted with their liberties; yet they had such reliance on the virtue of a future Congress, that they did not hesitate, expecting that they would be restored to them unimpaired, as soon as the Government commenced its operations conformably to what was mutually understood at the sealing and delivering up of those instruments.

It has been supposed that there is no danger to be apprehended from the General Government of an invasion of the rights of election. I will remind gentlemen of an instance in the Government of Holland. The patriots in that country fought no less strenuously for that prize than the people of America; yet, by giving to the States General powers not unlike those in this Constitution, their right of representation was abolished. That they once possessed it is certain, and that they made as much talk about its importance as we do; but now the right has ceased, all vacancies are filled by the men in power. It is our duty, therefore, to prevent our liberties from being fooled away in a similar manner; consequently, we ought to adopt the clause which secures to the General Government every thing that ought to be required.

Mr. MADISON observed, that it was the State Governments in the Seven United Provinces which had assumed to themselves the power of filling vacancies, and not the General Government; therefore the gentleman's application did not hold.

The question on Mr. SEDGWICK's motion for amending Mr. BURKE's proposition, was put and lost.

The question was then put on Mr. BURKE's motion, and the yeas and nays being demanded by the Constitutional number, they were taken as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Burke, Coles, Floyd, Gerry, Griffin, Grout, Hathorn, Heister, Jackson, Livermore, Matthews, Moore, Page, Parker, Partridge, Van Rensselaer, Seney, Sylvester, Smith, of South Carolina, Stone, Sluiter, Thatcher and Tucker—23.

NAYS.—Messrs. Ames, Benson, Boudinot, Brown, Cadwalader, Carroll, Clymer, Fitzsimons, Foster, Gale,

So it was determined in the negative. The House then resumed the consideration of the proposition respecting the apportioning of the representation to a certain ratio, proposed by Mr. AMES.

When, after some desultory conversation, it was agreed to, as follows: "After the first enumeration, required by the first article of the Constitution, there shall be one representative for every thirty thousand, until the number shall amount to one hundred. After which, the proportion shall be so regulated by Congress, that there shall be not less than one hundred representatives, nor less than one representative for every forty thousand persons, until the number of representatives shall amount to two hundred, after which, the proportion shall be so regulated by Congress, that there shall not be less than two hundred representatives, nor less than one representative for fifty thousand persons."

After which the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, August 22.

Memorials from the inhabitants of Trenton, in New Jersey, Lancaster, and Yorktown, in Pennsylvania, were presented, stating their advantages in soil, climate, situation, population, cultivation, and buildings; and praying that the permanent seat of Congress may be established at the same. The memorials were ordered to lie on the table.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments to the Constitution.

Mr. TUCKER moved the following as a proposition to be added to the same: "The Congress shall never impose direct taxes but where the moneys arising from the duties, imposts, and excise, are insufficient for the public exigencies, nor until Congress shall have made a requisition upon the States to assess, levy, and pay their respective proportions of such requisitions. And in case any State shall neglect or refuse to pay its proportion, pursuant to such requisition, then Congress may assess and levy such State's proportion, together with the interest thereon, at the rate of six per cent. per annum, from the time of payment prescribed by such requisition."

Mr. PAGE said, that he hoped every amendment to the Constitution would be considered separately in the manner this was proposed, but he wished them considered fully; it ought to have been referred to the committee of eleven, reported upon, and then to the Committee of the Whole. This was the manner in which the House had decided upon all those already agreed to; and this ought to be the manner in which this should be decided; he should be sorry to delay what was so nearly completed on any account. The House has but little time to sit, and the subject has to go before the Senate, therefore it requires of us all the expedition we can possibly give it. I would prefer putting a finishing hand to what has been already agreed to, and refer this to the Committee of eleven for their consideration.

Mr. TUCKER.—This proposition was referred to the committee, along with many others in the gross, but the Committee of eleven declined reporting upon it. I understood it to be in any gentleman's power to bring it forward when he thought proper, and it was under this influence that I proposed it, nor do I conceive it to be an improper time. The House is engaged in the discussion of amendments; they have made some progress, and I wish them to go on and complete what they have begun. This may be added without inconvenience, if it meet the sense of the House; but if it does not, I wish my constituents to be acquainted with our decision on the whole subject, and therefore hope it may be decided upon at this time.

Mr. JACKSON.—The gentleman has an undoubted right to bring forward the proposition; but I differ greatly with respect to its propriety. I hope, sir, the experience we have had will be sufficient to prevent us from ever agreeing to a relinquishment of such an essential power. The requisitions of the former Congress were ineffectual to obtain supplies; they remain to this day neglected by several States. If a sense of common danger, if war, and that a war of the noblest kind, a contest for liberty, were not sufficient to stimulate the States to a prompt compliance, when the means were abundant, by reason of the immense quantities of paper medium, can we ever expect an acquiescence to a requisition in future, when the only stimulus is honesty, to enable the Confederation to discharge the debts of the late war?

But suppose requisitions were likely to be, in some degree, complied with, (which, by the way, I never can admit,) in every case where a State had neglected or refused to furnish its quota, Congress must come in, assess, and collect it. Now, in every such case, I venture to affirm that jealousies would be excited, discontent would prevail, and civil wars break out. What less can gentlemen picture to themselves, when a Government has refused to perform its obligations, but that it will support its measures by the point of the bayonet?

Without the power of raising money to defray the expenses of Government, how are we to be secure against foreign invasion? What! can a Government exert itself, with its sinews torn from it? We can expect neither strength nor exertion; and without these are acquired and preserved, our union will not be lasting; we shall be rent asunder by intestine commotion, or exterior assault; and when that period arrives, we may bid adieu to all the blessings we have purchased at the price of our fortunes, and the blood of our worthiest heroes.

Mr. LIVERMORE thought this an amendment of more importance than any yet obtained; that it was recommended by five or six States, and therefore ought to engage their most serious consideration.

Amendments to the Constitution.

tion. It had been supposed that the United States would not attempt to levy direct taxes; but this was certainly a mistake. He believed nothing but the difficulty of managing the subject would deter them. The modes of levying and collecting taxes pursued by the several States are so various, that it is an insuperable obstacle to an attempt by the General Government.

He was sensible that the requisitions of the former Congress had not been fully complied with, and the defect of the Confederation was, that the Government had no powers to enforce a compliance. The proposition now under consideration obviated that difficulty. Suppose one or two States refused to comply, certainly the force of the others could compel them, and that is all that ought to be required; because it is not to be supposed that a majority of the States will refuse, as such an opposition must destroy the Union. He hoped the States would be left to furnish their quotas in a manner the most easy to themselves, as was requested by more than half of the present Union.

Unless something more effectual was done to improve the Constitution, he knew his constituents would be dissatisfied. As to the amendments already agreed to, they would not value them more than a pinch of snuff; they went to secure rights never in danger.

Mr. PAGE wished the proposition might be re-committed, for he was certain there was neither time nor inclination to add it to those already agreed upon.

He observed that the warmest friends to amendments differ in opinion on this subject; many of them have ceased urging it, while others have become strenuous advocates for the reverse. The most judicious and discerning men now declare that the Government ought never to part with this power. For his part, experience had convinced him that no reliance was to be had on requisitions, when the States had treated them with contempt in the hour of danger, and had abundant means of compliance. The public credit stood at this moment in the utmost need of support, and he could not consent to throw down one of its strongest props. He thought there was no danger of an abuse of this power, for the Government would not have recourse to it while the Treasury could be supplied from any other source; and when they did, they would be studious of adapting their law to the convenience of the States. He hoped, when the gentleman returned home to New Hampshire, his constituents would give him credit for his exertions, and be better satisfied with the amendments than he now supposed them to be.

Mr. SUMNER felt himself so sensibly impressed with the importance of the subject, that if he apprehended the proposition would not have a fair discussion at this time, he would second the motion of commitment, and had not a doubt but the House would acquiesce in it.

Gentlemen had said that the States had this business much at heart. Yes, he would venture to say more, that if the power was not relinquished by the General Government, the State Governments would be annihilated. If every resource is taken from them, what remains in the power of the States for their support, or for the extinguishment of their domestic debt?

Mr. GENAY thought if the proposition was referred, that it ought to go to a Committee of the Whole, for he wished it to have a full and candid discussion. He would have something left in the power of every State to support itself, independent of the United States, and therefore was not satisfied with the amendment proposed. The Constitution, in its original state, gives to Congress the power of levying and collecting taxes, duties, imposts, and excise. The fault here is, that every thing is relinquished to the General Government. Now, the amendment gives the same power, with qualification, that there shall have been a previous requisition. This by no means came up to his idea; he thought that some particular revenue ought to be secured to the States, so as to enable them to support themselves.

He apprehended, when this clause in the Constitution was under the consideration of the several State conventions, they would not so readily have ratified it, if they had considered it more fully in the point of view in which he had now placed it; but if they had ratified it, it would have been under a conviction that Congress would admit such amendments as were necessary to the existence of the State Governments. At present, the States are divested of every means to support themselves. If they discover a new source of revenue, after Congress shall have diverted all the old ones into their treasury, the rapacity of the General Government can take that from them also. The States can have recourse to no tax, duty, impost, or excise, but what may be taken from them whenever the Congress shall be so disposed; and yet gentlemen must see that the annihilation of the State Governments will be followed by the ruin of this.

Now, what is the consequence of the amendment? Either the States will or will not comply with the requisitions. If they comply, they voluntarily surrender their means of support; if they refuse, the arms of Congress are raised to compel them, which, in all probability, may lay the foundation for civil war. What umbrage must it give every individual to have two sets of collectors and tax-gatherers surrounding his doors; the people then soured, and a direct refusal by the Legislature, will be the occasion of perpetual discord. He wished to alter this proposition in such a manner as to secure the support of the Federal Government and the State Governments likewise, and therefore wished the amendment referred to a Committee of the whole House.

Mr. TUCKER.—I do not see the arguments in favor of giving Congress this power in so forcible a light as some gentlemen do. It will be to erect an imperium in imperio, which is generally considered to be subversive of all Government. At any time that Congress shall exercise this power, it will raise commotions in the States; whereas, the mode of requisitions will operate in so easy a way, by being so consonant to the habits of the people, that the supplies will be sooner realized in the treasury by this means than by any other. It will require a length of time to form a uniform system of taxation, that shall operate equally and justly through all the States; though I doubt the possibility of forming such a system. It has been said, that requisitions have not been complied with in former times, but it is to be hoped that there will not be so much difficulty in future. The supplies from the impost will greatly diminish the requisitions; besides, should any of the States refuse to comply, they will be liable to the exercise of the power of Congress in the very heart of their country. This power will be so disagreeable, that the very dread of it will stimulate the States to an immediate and prompt compliance with the requisitions. This amendment has been proposed by several of the States, and by some of the most important ones. For this and other reasons that have been offered on the subject, I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Several methods were proposed for disposing of this question for the present; but the motion for its lying on the table being put and negatived, Mr. PARTRIDGE, referring to his instructions, was so pious that this amendment should not be too precipitately decided upon, and moved the previous question, which was negatived.

Mr. SEDGWICK said, that he believed his mind was as strongly impressed with the force of the instructions he had received from his constituents, as that of other gentlemen. But, sir, a Government entrusted with the freedom and the very existence of the people, ought surely to possess, in a most ample degree, the means of supporting its own existence; and as we do not know what circumstances we may be in, or how necessary it may be for Congress to exercise this power, I should deem it a violation of the oath I have taken to support the Constitution were I now to vote for this amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN remarked, that if Congress should exercise this power, the taxes would be laid by the immediate representatives of the people; neither would it be necessary to adopt one uniform method of collecting direct taxes. The several States might be accommodated by a reference to their respective modes of taxation.

The question upon the paragraph being called for from every part of the House, the yeas and nays were taken.

YEAS—Messrs. Burke, Coles, Floyd, Grout, Hathorn, Livermore, Van Rensselaer, Sumter, and Tucker—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Benson, Brown, Cadwalader, Carroll, Clymer, Fitzsimons, Foster, Gale, Gilman, Goodhue, Hartley, Heister, Jackson, Lawrence, Lee, Madison, Matthews, Moore, Muhlenburg, Page, Parker, Partridge, Schureman, Scott, Sedgwick, Seney, Sherman, Sylvester, Simeonson, Smith, (of Maryland,) Smith, of South Carolina, Stone, Sturgis, Thatcher, Trumbull, Vining, and Wadsworth—39.

Mr. TUCKER proposed the following amendment to the Constitution:

Article 1, section 8, clause 9, strike out the words, "tribunals superior" to the Supreme Court," and insert the words "courts of admiralty."

And on the question being put, it passed in the negative.

He then moved for a further amendment to the Constitution, as follows:

In the third section of the sixth article insert the word "other" between the word "no" and the word "religious."

And on the question that the House do agree to the said amendment, it passed in the negative.

Mr. GRAY moved to add to the amendments already agreed to the following articles, to wit: "That Congress erect no company of merchants with exclusive advantages of commerce." And on the question that the House do agree to the said proposed article, it passed in the negative. He introduced another motion, to add to the amendments already agreed to the following article, to wit:

"Congress shall at no time consent that any person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall accept of a title of nobility or any other title or office from any King, Prince, or foreign State."

And on the question being put, it was negatived. Mr. BENSON introduced a resolution to the following purport:

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the following amendments to the Constitution of the United States having been agreed to by two-thirds of both Houses, be submitted to the Legislatures of the several States; which, when ratified, in whole, or in part, by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as parts of the said Constitution.

This resolution was referred to a committee consisting of Messrs. BENSON, SHERMAN, and SEDGWICK, who were directed to arrange the said amendments and make report thereof.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. GOODHUE moved that the report of the joint committee on the adjournment be made the order of the day for Monday next. Passed in the affirmative.

TREASURY BILL.

The committee on the part of the House appointed to confer with the Senate on their amendment to the Treasury bill, being called on to report, Mr. MADISON reported verbally, that the committee had met and conferred upon the subject; that the members on the part of the Senate stated the reasons on which their amendment was founded, which not being satisfactory to the committee on the part of the House, they submitted certain propositions to the committee of the Senate, who, on their part, offered none. Mr. MADISON further reported, that it is the opinion of the committee on the part of the House, that it would not be right for the House to recede from their disagreement.

Adjournment.

MONDAY, August 24.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee appointing the salaries of the Executive officers of Government, with their assistants and clerks, which was received and read the first time.

Mr. BENSON, from the committee appointed for the purpose, reported an arrangement of the articles of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as agreed to by the House on Friday last; also, a resolution prefixed to the same, which resolution was twice read and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of both Houses deeming it necessary,) That the following articles be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as amendments to the Constitution of the United States, all or any of which articles, when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, to be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the said Constitution.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do carry to the Senate a fair engrossed copy of the said proposed articles of amendment, and desire their concurrence.

ADJOURNMENT.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the report of the joint committee, on the adjournment.

Mr. Vining was against taking up this report. He thought it appeared absurd to enter into a discussion of the question at this moment; it would necessarily bring on a great deal of debate, and consume much time, and would likewise counteract the object of gentlemen entirely, while so many important subjects were yet undecided, which must be attended to and finished previous to a recess. He moved for a postponement, in order to take up the Treasury bill.

Mr. HARTLEY said, that the honorable gentleman's remarks furnished the best argument for coming to a determination upon the adjournment at the present time, as it was the best way to confine the attention of the House to the essentials which claimed their immediate attention and decision.

Mr. SEDGWICK was in favor of deciding on the report immediately; he contended that the public business would be expedited thereby; this remark, he said, was founded upon experience. When the time is fixed, and gentlemen are fully impressed with the importance of despatching business in a given time, they will exert themselves to the utmost. He had known as much business transacted in the Assembly of Massachusetts in one week, and as well done, as had been before in three. He further observed that many gentlemen were anxious to go home; that the sickly season was approaching, and that if an adjournment does not take place, the members will be so thinned off, that in all probability a much less number than the present will be left to do business.

The motion of Mr. Vining was withdrawn, and Mr. MADISON proposed the following resolution:

Resolved, That when this House does adjourn, on the first Monday in December next, they will adjourn to the first Monday in December next.

Mr. SCOTT objected to this. He said it was too short a period; it would not admit of the members who lived at the extremities of the Union to go home and return by the time mentioned.

Mr. LIVERMORE was also opposed to it, and proposed to adjourn on the first of September.

Mr. GOODHUE said, he conceived those gentlemen who talked of adjourning on the first of September did not wish for any adjournment at all. He contended for a short adjournment, as proposed by the resolution; some relaxation from business is necessary; it is a so expedient to consult our constituents; some alterations may be found necessary in the laws we have enacted. We can judge better of that necessity from our observation and conversation with our constituents in our respective States, than we can from any other information.

Mr. AMES was in favor of the motion, and proposed to fill the blank with 22d September, which was carried in the affirmative.

Mr. SUMNER objected to the shortness of the time of adjournment. The business now before us cannot be completed, if we may judge by what has already taken place. The recess will be so short, that none of the advantages expected to be derived from consulting our constituents can be realized by those from a remote quarter of the Union. Short recesses are attended with great expense. Our conduct in adjourning for so short a time, and leaving so much business unfinished, can never be approved by the people. Gentlemen talk of their private concerns; I do not think that any member has made a greater proportionable sacrifice than I have. But the public good is to be chiefly regarded; we ought not to be influenced by our private concerns. He hoped that some plan of accommodation would take place.

Mr. AMES introduced the foregoing resolutions in the form following, viz: "That the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, do adjourn their respective Houses of Congress on the 22d of September next, to meet on the first Monday in December next."

Mr. JACKSON said that the time was too short; it would not admit of the members who come from a distance to consult their constituents, and so far the advantage of an adjournment would be lost. Let us view the matter in another point of light; alarms have been spread respecting the compensations; this will increase those alarms, for it will be said that a very great expense is needlessly incurred. If we sit two months longer, the public business would be so far completed as to supersede the necessity of meeting in December. He thought the adjournment ought to be to the first Monday in March, and the Constitution would warrant this; mutual concessions ought to be made for the accommodation of all. At the time proposed, the cold-season will be advanced; the ice and snow will prevent the gentlemen at the Eastward and Northward from attending to their private business; hence that season will be adapted to their convenience. But let us look to the members from the Southward; it ought to be considered that their relaxed constitutions will be greatly exposed by the intense cold of this northern climate; besides, it will then be their busy season for planting; some concession ought therefore to be made. The Southern members would sooner forfeit their seats in this House, than be obliged to come here in the Winter; this will operate to deprive the remote parts of the Union of their representation. He therefore moved that the time be extended to the first of March.

Mr. GERRY was opposed to so short an adjournment; he stated the expense that would attend it, and made it twenty thousand dollars, a sum that would pay Congress for fifty days' attendance. This, he said, rendered it demonstrable that it would be most prudent for Congress to continue the session and terminate the business. If it is absolutely necessary to any particular gentleman to go home, leave may be granted. He trusted, he said, that there was no member who thought himself of so much consequence that the Government could not proceed without him, or that Congress thought so; if they should, when such a member departs, the business must stand still. Reference has been had to out-door conversation, and we are cautioned to beware of exciting popular clamor. But he trusted that ideas of this kind are not to influence the deliberations of this assembly, or deter us from deciding what we think is just and best.

Mr. JACKSON said he was surprised to hear a gentleman cautioning the House against being influenced by public clamor, and the opinions of people out of doors, especially as that gentleman has, within a fortnight past, raised more bugbears from that source than all the House besides.

Mr. BOURNINO said that he supposed the time between this and the adjournment will be sufficient to complete the organization of the Judiciary and Executive Departments. The adjournment will, in the common course of events, allow the members from Georgia three or four weeks to be at home. A short recess is absolutely necessary, a long one may be highly injurious.

Mr. VINING recapitulated a number of articles now pending before Congress, upon which it is presumed that it is not necessary to consult our constituents. We already know their sentiments; this business must absolutely be attended to, and completed previous to a recess. He was opposed to the motion for adjourning till March; but on a conciliatory plan he would agree to the first of January.

Mr. TUCKER said he conceived that the business was taken up wrong; the resolution proposed was entirely improper; it puts it in the power of the Speaker, with the concurrence of the Senate, to adjourn the House on that day, let circumstances be what they may. This was unprecedented, and could not be agreed to.

Mr. JACKSON called for the previous question on Mr. Ames's motion, and on the question, "Shall the main question now be put?" it passed in the affirmative.

The main question being put, it passed in the affirmative by a large majority.

The amendment of the Senate to the Treasury bill was taken into consideration; and Mr. MADISON, from the Committee on Conference, made a verbal report.

Mr. VINING moved that the House would now adhere to their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate.

Messrs. SHERMAN, PAGE, and GERRY, made some observations against the motion, which was, however, carried in the affirmative.

JUDICIARY.

The House now resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States," Mr. BOURNINO in the Chair.

On motion of Mr. BENSON, the word "federal" was struck out of the first clause.

Mr. LIVERMORE moved to strike out from the clause "the Supreme Court shall consist of a Chief Justice and four Associate Justices" the word "four," and insert "three" in its stead.

Mr. SEBOWICK supposed the motion went to strike out the subsequent sentence, where a quorum was defined; he was opposed to this, because he thought a quorum ought to consist of a majority of the Judges, in order that there might be some stability in their decisions. It was of great importance to have the law established in such a way as not to be subjected to frequent changes.

Mr. JACKSON inquired how a point of law could be determined when four Judges were on the bench, and they decided two and two? He hoped they would be either increased or diminished, and therefore should vote for striking out.

Mr. LIVERMORE did not apprehend that the Associate Judges would always be on the bench, and therefore meant to strike out one of the number affixed, as a quorum.

Mr. BENSON said, the Senate had employed a great deal of time in perfecting this bill, and, he believed, had done it tolerably well; besides, the session was now drawing to a close; he therefore wished as few alterations as possible to be made in it, lest they should not get it through before the adjournment.

Mr. GERRY inquired whether it was essential that the Chief Justice should be on the bench, in order to form a Supreme Court? If it was not, there might be two Supreme Courts sitting at the same time, provided they increased the Associate Justices in the manner talked of by one gentleman, and diminished the quorum in the manner hinted at by another.

Mr. JACKSON said, the decisions of the courts in England were not to influence the House, when they had an opportunity of improving a plan that was defective.

Judiciary.

Mr. LIVERMORE's motion was negatived.

Mr. BURKE moved that "Chief Justice" should be struck out. It is, he said, a concomitant of royalty.

Mr. BENSON observed that this was a provision of the Constitution; and upon this information Mr. BURKE withdrew his motion.

Mr. TUCKER was in favor of striking out the whole clause, and against dividing the United States into districts, for the purpose of instituting inferior Federal courts. He said the State courts were fully competent to the purposes for which these courts were to be created, and that they would be a burdensome and useless expense. Mr. SUMNER seconded the motion.

Mr. LIVERMORE was against striking out the whole clause. He wished to have the United States divided into districts; but he concurred with the other idea of the gentleman. He wished for all the districts, except in Kentucky, to be abolished; for the sake of forming a Court of Admiralty in each, authorized not only to take cognizance of all marine concerns, but also of all seizures.

Mr. TUCKER said, he did not move to strike out the district to prevent the establishment of Admiralty Courts; he approved of such courts; but he presumed the States composed sufficient districts. This motion was negatived.

Mr. LIVERMORE then moved to strike out the words, "one to be called Kentucky district." He observed, that as the matters which would come under the cognizance of these courts would be chiefly of a marine nature, Kentucky, from its situation, could have nothing to do with them; consequently, to establish them there, would be a needless expense.

This motion was determined in the negative.

Mr. LIVERMORE.—I now move you, sir, to strike out the whole of this clause. I fear this principle of establishing Judges of a Supreme Court will lead to an entire new system of jurisprudence, and fill every State in the Union with two kinds of courts for the trial of many causes. A thing so heterogeneous must give great disgust. Sir, it will be establishing a Government within a Government, and one must prevail upon the ruin of the other. Nothing, in my opinion, can irritate the inhabitants so generally, as to see their neighbors dragged before two tribunals for the same offence. Mankind in general are unfriendly to courts of justice; they are vexed with law-suits for debts or trespasses; and though I do not doubt but the most impartial administration of justice will take place, yet they will feel the imposition burdensome and disagreeable. People in general do not view the necessity of courts of justice with the eye of a civilian; they look upon laws rather as intended for punishment than protection; they will think we are endeavoring to irritate them, rather than to establish a Government to sit easy upon them.

Will any gentleman say that the Constitution cannot be administered without this establishment?

ment? I am clearly of a different opinion; I think it can be administered better without than with it. There is already in each State a system of jurisprudence congenial to the wishes of its citizens. I never heard it complained that justice was not distributed with an equal hand in all of them; I believe it is so, and the people think it so. We had better then continue them than introduce a system replete with expense, and altogether unnecessary.

Nor will this expense be inconsiderable; we must have a double suit of salary judges, attorneys general, marshals, clerks, and constables, together with jails and court-houses; and all this for what? To try a man over again who has been acquitted by the State courts, in cases of concurrent jurisdiction, or from an apprehension that the State courts may err. The State courts have hitherto decided all cases of a national or local import; and it was never heard that they determined with any degree of partiality. Perhaps a maritime case, that was carried by appeal before the court for final determination in cases of capture, where the judgment was reversed, may be thought an exception; but whether this case was decided rightly or wrongly at last, I shall not pretend to say at present. Now, if the State courts have hitherto had cognizance of similar cases, and proceeded on them with impartiality, what occasion is there for a new institution? I cannot possibly conceive, unless it be to plague mankind.

But, besides the expense of judges, marshals, &c., there will be another difficulty; there must be procured jurors for such courts, for I presume it is not intended that they shall try causes without a jury. Now, how is this jury to be constituted? Are they to come to the Supreme Court from the county in which the offence has been committed, or is the court to go to that place? We have heard cases spoken of, to arise under the mountains of Carolina, and be dragged down to the sea-shore; but the inconvenience of three or four hundred miles is nothing compared with what may take place under this system. Certainly this consideration must offer difficulties to every gentleman's mind; difficulties which can easily be avoided by pursuing another route.

But after the trial follow judgment and execution. Now what mode will you pursue to complete your process? There are various ways of levying an execution in the different States; in some States the land is attached; in others, the personal estate; sometimes the debtor is confined in jail, or, in case he breaks jail, the county has to pay the debt. I hope the Government will not adopt this last mode, or escapes may be made in great number. I apprehend we shall find the execution offer no inconsiderable obstacle to our system.

Now, why engage in a plan so obnoxious and difficult without necessity? Gentlemen will not pretend to be afraid of erroneous decisions, because they may be subject to appeal and revision, which furnishes as great security as it is possible to have in any system of jurisprudence whatever. For my part, I contemplate with horror the effects of the plan; I think I see a foundation laid for discord, civil wars, and all its concomitants. To avert these evils, I hope the House will reject the proposed system.

On motion, the House now adjourned.

TUESDAY, August 25.

SALARIES OF EXECUTIVE OFFICERS.

The bill for establishing the salaries of the Executive officers of the Government, with their assistants and clerks, was read the second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to provide for the safe-keeping of the acts, records, and seal of the United States; for the due publication of the copies of Congress; for the authentication of the copies of records; for making out and recording commissions, and prescribing their form; and for establishing the fees of office to be taken for making out such commissions, and for copies of records and papers; Mr. Boudinot in the Chair.

After some time spent thereon, the committee rose, and reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they recede from so much of the eighth amendment to the bill to establish the Treasury Department, as was disagreed to by the House, and insisted on by the Senate; and that they have also agreed to the resolution of the House of the 24th instant, appointing the time for the adjournment of both Houses of Congress. The House then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, August 26.

SALARIES OF EXECUTIVE OFFICERS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to provide for the safe-keeping of the acts, records, and seal of the United States; for the publication of the copies of Congress; for the authentication of the copies of records; for making out and recording commissions, and prescribing their form; and for establishing the fees of office to be taken for making out such commissions, and for copies of records and papers; Mr. Boudinot in the Chair.

The committee having gone through the bill, reported it, with the amendments made thereto, to the House; which being agreed to.

Ordered, That the bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate had passed the bill for registering and clearing vessels, regulating the coasting trade, and for other purposes, with several amendments; and which they desired the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the said bill; and, after having made some progress therein, the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, August 27.

The engrossed bill to provide for the safe-keeping of the acts, records, and seal of the United States; for the due publication of the acts of Congress; for the authentication of the copies of records; for making out and recording commissions, and prescribing their form; and for establishing the fees of office to be taken for making out such commissions, and for copies of records and papers, was read a third time, and passed.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill for registering and clearing vessels, regulating the coasting trade, and for other purposes; and agreed to all the amendments, with amendments to the third and fifty-seventh amendments, as follows:

Third amendment.—In lieu of the words proposed to be stricken out by the Senate, insert the words, "shall be in the form following, viz."

Fifty-seventh amendment.—After the word "sworn," in the clauses proposed to be inserted by the Senate, insert the words "or affirmed."

Mr. Gerry, from the committee appointed to prepare and report an estimate of the supplies requisite for the present year, made a further report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Smith (of South Carolina) from the committee appointed for the purpose, presented a bill providing for the establishment of hospitals for the relief of sick and disabled seamen, and prescribing regulations for the harbors of the United States; which was received, and read the first time.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred a letter from the Postmaster General, which lay on the table; whereupon Ordered, That the said report be committed to Messrs. Boudinot, Goodhue, and Lee.

PERMANENT SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.

Mr. Scott, agreeably to notice given, moved the following:

"That a permanent residence ought to be fixed for the General Government of the United States, at some convenient place as near the centre of wealth, population, and extent of territory, as may be consistent with convenience to the navigation of the Atlantic ocean, and having due regard to the particular situation of the Western country."

He then moved to make this motion the order of the day for Thursday next.

Mr. Smith (of South Carolina) moved to let it lie on the table.

Mr. Sherman objected to it. He thought the House had as much business of importance already before them as they could possibly despatch, without entering on this. Neither was the Government in possession of resources at present for the establishment of a federal town. He therefore moved to defer taking this motion into consideration until the second Monday in December.

Mr. Hartley was in favor of the motion, and hoped it would prevail. Those gentlemen, he said, who lived near New York, might perhaps be satisfied if it was not discussed for years to come; but justice to the Union at large, and to the inhabitants of this city in particular, required that it should be soon settled. They were going to incur great expenses for erecting a palace for the President, and for other objects. If the presumption on which this project was founded was not well grounded, it was just and proper that they should be undeceived, and not induced to spend their money without a prospect of compensation. A regard to their interests, therefore, required that we should let them know what they were to depend upon. He thought, also, that some attention ought to be paid to the petitions of the people respecting a permanent seat of Government.

Mr. Burke said: he thought it would be doing great injustice to the Southern States to fix on so early a day in the next session, as it was probable that the members for those States would not have assembled by that time.

Mr. Fitzsimons thought the present time was the most proper to determine this business. There was now a pretty full representation. It was not probable, he said, that, at any future time, there would be so great a number collected; certainly at no period of the Winter season. He acknowledged there was business of great importance before Congress; but was there any more important than the subject proposed? It was a question in which the people of every part of the Union were deeply interested. As to the expense, that was an after consideration. The present object was only to fix the place; and whether the removal was to be made this year or the next, was a different affair. It had been remarked, that jealousies existed among the States. They were not likely to be removed by inattention to so great a concern.

Mr. Sherman said, it was merely to accommodate the gentlemen who were so urgent, that he moved the second Monday in December. It was evident that there would be too little time this season. But if the gentleman from South Carolina thought it too early a day for the Southern members to meet, he was willing to agree to a more distant day.

In addition to the arguments adduced for deferring this matter, there was another important consideration. The Union was not yet complete. North Carolina and Rhode Island had not a voice in the Legislature. He thought, nevertheless, their wishes and interest ought to be consulted; and, in a transaction which is to affect them so essentially, they ought to have a concurrent voice. It was supposed, and that upon good grounds, that it would not be long before North Carolina would be united to the Government. She was entitled to six voices, and Rhode Island to one. The continent ought to be properly balanced on this question.

Mr. Smith (of South Carolina) moved that the first Monday in January next should be assigned for taking up this subject. He was against entering upon it at present, because the House had more important business before them, which could not be deferred without material injury to the Government. The Judiciary bill, he said, was pressing, and had been the order of the day for several weeks. The funding of the public debt was an object of great magnitude, and was earnestly expected. If the House did the duty that they owed to their constituents, it was of little importance in what place it was executed, provided it was done, and done to their satisfaction.

Mr. Scott thought the principles of the Union were the principles of equal justice and reciprocity. He conceived the question now before the House as grand a link as any in the federal chain. The future tranquillity and well-being of the United States, he said, depended as much on this as on any other question that ever had or could come before Congress. It was a justice due to the extremities of the continent to adopt some measure. It being, therefore, a point with them, and of justice too, he could not conceive how any gentlemen, who had the welfare of their country at heart, could oppose it.

The resolution held out this general idea, that the seat of the Federal Government ought to be fixed at the most central place, with respect to population and territory, having an equal regard to the Atlantic and western parts of the Union. When the central line between the northern and southern extremities was fixed, no person in the Western Territory had ever wished anything further than that Congress should establish their seat as far back on this line as the convenience of maritime commerce would allow.

He thought those people expected—they had a right to demand it—as it was founded on justice. If, then, this principle was allowed, the subject would be speedily determined, and could not involve much debate, because they had nothing more than to find that spot in which the centres were combined.

This he conceived to be a favorable moment to determine the great question that had agitated the minds of the people for several years. We might be assured, that at this time Congress possessed all their virtue and innocence; but it might be feared that would not be the case in future. Congress were now free from all factions, and as devoid as possible of the spirit of party and local views. It may happen that in a future day faction may compel Government to fix on some improper place, and one of two events would result from this: either they would be obliged to remove after expending great sums of money on this imprudent establishment, or the Union would be dissolved.

Mr. Livermore said, that the two Houses had come to a resolution to adjourn next month. Many weighty matters were still before the Legislature. How long a time the discussion of this subject would require was uncertain; it might engross a deal of time, and be productive of animosity and party spirit, which the measure itself proposes to guard against. He wished first to have the organization of Government finished, and those important duties fulfilled which the public anxiously expected.

Permanent Seat of Government.

He did not understand, he said, that any gentleman was uneasy in his present situation. He had not heard any complaints. Congress are well accommodated for the present in this city. There may be other places, no doubt, where Congress might be accommodated; but he believed both the citizens of New York and the members of the Legislature were mutually satisfied. He had not heard of any memorial from the former informing Congress that they were tired of them, or requesting them to remove. Many parts of the country appear extremely anxious to have Congress with them. There is Trenton, Germantown, Carlisle, Lancaster, Yorktown, and Reading, have sent us abundance of petitions, setting forth their various advantages; we wish the inhabitants may enjoy the benefits of them, and if they are pleasantly situated, and have plenty of fish, we are very glad to hear it; and if it should ever suit Congress to remove to any of them, why Congress will enjoy the benefit of them also. He could not see any reason that all the important matters should be postponed in order to consider this. If all these matters could be despatched by next Spring, and the road should be impassable, he would be for taking it up.

He said the idea of a permanent seat of Government was not in itself strictly true. As population increased, and men of new principles and views took their seats in Congress, this permanent seat might be altered at pleasure. It was certainly wise in Congress to be economical; a removal was always found very expensive; the finances of their country were not at present adequate to new expenses, consequently they ought not to be incurred. He further observed, that a great variety of objects were necessary to be considered in fixing the seat of Government, besides the mathematical centrality; the salubrity of the situation was a capital circumstance. He hoped the subject would not be taken up this session.

Mr. Scott thought the gentleman treated the subject in a cavalier manner; it might be well in him to do so, as he did not like a long journey; but he hoped the House were not disposed to trifles with a subject of this magnitude.

Mr. Jackson said, upon this subject depended the existence of the Union. The place of the seat of Government was important in every view. It might be compared, he said, to the heart of the human body; it was the centre from which the principles of life were carried to the extremities, and from these it might return again with precision.

It was indifferent to him whether the subject was determined now or at the next session, but he thought it best that the motion should lie on the table.

Mr. Sumner seconded his motion.

Mr. Stone remarked, that this was a very important business, and required a deal of caution to conduct it. He knew of no question that would have a greater tendency to produce broils and divisions arose, chiefly from an indiscreet mode of conducting business of this kind. He was glad to see the temperate spirit with which the House began, and wished it might continue; but he apprehended that no question would so fully prove the temper of this body as the present.

The question was then taken on Mr. Smith's motion, and lost—yeas, 21, nays 30.

Mr. Speaker being about to put the question on the second Monday in December,

Mr. Ames inquired if the motion to adjourn on the twenty-second of September was not inconsistent with the resolution now offered to the House? A committee had been appointed to report the business of the present session. The committee reported, and so much of that report was accepted as related to the time of adjournment. It therefore appeared to him, that the proposition to take up this subject at the present time was superseded. He was confident it was inconsistent with that determination. It would become necessary to rescind the determination; but whether that would be done or not, depended on the disposition of the Senate. Should they not concur, the House would waste their time, and be obliged to leave the most important business unfinished.

He said he could not suppress some emotions of surprise that gentlemen should propound questions which had not for their object the complete organization of the Government. It lies, as yet, prostrate and inanimate; and instead of infusing life into it, and giving motion to the machine, we have been altering our Constitution; and are now entering into a lengthy discussion to determine where we shall sit.

If the gentleman's motion only involved a few abstract propositions in it, it would not be of much importance; but he saw how difficult their decision would be. Were I a stranger, I should apprehend, from the manner in which the motion had been introduced, that it would be a question agitated with as much acrimony as any whatever.

I ever found it a difficult task, on the most trivial occasions, to obtain unanimity. What, then, must be the divisions on a question, which some gentlemen have said the very existence and peace of the Union depends upon? I believe it will involve as many passions as the human heart can display. Every principle of local interest, of pride and honor, and even of patriotism, are engaged. If the good of the Union requires that the seat of Government should be fixed at Pittsburgh, I am willing to pledge myself to the honorable gentleman I will vote for it; but I must now vote for postponing the business. It is not sufficient to determine where the seat of Government ought to be, but it is necessary the public mind should be prepared to concur with ours. In the decision of questions of this magnitude, where our interests are so materially concerned, the reasons ought to be made public, and they ought to correspond with those of the people.

When I left my constituents, I had no conception of proceedings like this; neither have I as yet formed my opinion; when I do, I pledge myself that it shall not spring from local or selfish principles.

The honorable gentleman has introduced this subject as a very important one: we will consider it as such. If only the centre was to be determined, it might be settled in a very short time. If the oaks and the mountains are to be numbered, if the acres in the United States are also to be the ground of our decision, perhaps a few days' calculation may settle the business.

My opinion is, that the centre of Government ought to be a centre of convenience and utility; that the heart should be so placed as to propel the blood to the extremities, with the most equable and gentle motion. I would place the Government where it might most effectually guard the extremes, and protect the weak parts. I sincerely wish that the territory now subject to the laws of the Union may continue so, and that Government may be so situated as to be enabled to exert its force with the best advantage to ensure the preservation of the Union, and compel obedience to its laws.

The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. Sherman) has justly said that North Carolina and Rhode Island should have a voice in this business.

He said he would not impute unworthy motives to the gentleman who introduced the motion, but would ask him whether the people at large ought not to be equally convinced of their purity? whether, in justice to himself, and to the subject generally, the public mind ought to be better prepared for the occasion? He was not convinced that the Government, ill-cemented and feeble as it is, could stand the shock of such a measure; and therefore he most earnestly deprecated the event.

Mr. Scott said, that rather than lose so much time in debating as to the time when the business should be taken up, he would consent to let it lie on the table till it was called for; for he conceived the last vote showed the sense of the House to be in favor of taking it up at the present session.

Mr. Hartley said, that he was of opinion with his colleague, that the sentiments of the House were fully established by the last vote, and therefore hoped gentlemen would permit the question to be taken without prolonging the debate.

Mr. Sewerick could wish as early a period as might be for taking up the business. He had no idea that the seat of the Federal Government should be in New York, or in any place so far North as this city; he would have no objection to attending to it immediately, if it was supposed Congress had time to discuss it temperately. Impressed with this idea, he would wish it deferred until the last Tuesday in December.

Mr. Ames said, that he did not wish to evade the question, but was fully of opinion with his colleague, that it could not now be discussed, and therefore joined him in wishing it might be postponed until the last of December.

The question being put for the last Tuesday in December, it passed in the negative: Yeas 21, nays 29.

Mr. Hartley insisted upon the motion for making it the order of the day for next Thursday. Mr. Wadsworth said, that he had no objection to it, for he was ready to meet the question, since gentlemen were so extremely pressing in bringing it forward.

Mr. Smith (of South Carolina) moved to make it conditionally the order of the day for Thursday sennight; that is, provided the House had gone through the Judicial bill.

Mr. Paor approved of Thursday sennight, and hoped the question would be discussed with temper.

The question of Thursday sennight was put and lost.

On the question for making it the order of the day for Thursday next, it passed in the affirmative: Yeas 27, nays 23.

And then the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, August 28.

PUBLIC CREDITORS.

Mr. Fitzsimons presented the following petition from the public creditors in the State of Pennsylvania:

To his Excellency the President, and the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The memorial and petition of the public creditors who are citizens of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, by their committee duly authorized and instructed,

MOST RESPECTFULLY SHOW:

That your memorialists, influenced by a faithful and uniform attachment to the happiness and glory of their country, behold, with peculiar satisfaction, the establishment of a Government which is expressly constituted to promote and perpetuate union, order, and justice, the great sources of national prosperity; and when they consider the characters that are appointed to organize and administer this system, they embrace the most flattering hope that in its execution will be found an ample performance of the auspicious promises which are contained in its principles. From this anticipation, indeed, your memorialists, whose services and sufferings in the public cause cannot require a particular attestation, have derived that consolation which the inability of the former Union, and the political vicissitudes of their own immediate State, would not permit them to indulge.

In the hour of extreme necessity, when complicated want enfeebled, and impending ruin agitated, their country, your memorialists avow an honorable pride in the remembrance of the exertions by which they then essentially contributed to her protection and safety. At the same time they partook of the toils and dangers of active life, and suffered in the ruinous depreciation of the paper currency, at least in common with their fellow-citizens, the wealth which had been transmitted to them by their ancestors or accumulated by their industry, the fund which prudence had hoarded to administer comfort to old age, and the supply which humanity had provided for the helpless infant or the solitary widow, they advanced with a liberal and patriotic hand to relieve the exigencies of the Union. The public faith was pledged by every solemnity of assurance; the honor of the States was bound, by every tie of gratitude, to compensate so memorable a sacrifice of private interest and personal immunity. Yet your memorialists, calling your attention to a melancholy retrospect, might remind you of the ineffectual though virtuous efforts of the late Congress to discharge the national engagements, might describe the apparent disregard of the States for their confederated sovereignty, though recently purchased through a long and bloody conflict; and, in the language of calamity and complaint, might deplore the disappointment, the poverty, the wretchedness, and the anguish, which afflicted the first and firmest patriots of the Union; excluding them from a participation in the triumphs of independence, and embittering their love of liberty with a painful sense of the injuries which they sustained. Such reflections, however, your memorialists cheerfully disavow, in the contemplation of that compact which, providing for the dignity and honor of the Union, has made the payment of the public debt a fundamental principle of the Government, and, having imposed the obligation, has also created an adequate power to discharge it.

But your memorialists now humbly confess that they have waited in anxious suspense for some evidence of the disposition of Congress upon this interesting subject. They admit the general importance of the arrangements which have occupied the attention of the Federal Legislature; and they particularly rejoice in the foundation that has been laid for the production of an efficient revenue. Those, however, are but preliminary steps to the attainment of the principal object of the new system: and should Congress adjourn without any more decisive act for the restoration of public credit, the mere institution of offices or the regulation of impost will hardly protect the American character from the derision of its enemies, or the reproaches of those who have hitherto thought that the want of power was its only imperfection.

Your memorialists, with the utmost deference, beg leave to represent, that public credit is the vital spark of modern policy. For the history of the world demonstrates, that whatever may be the extent of territory, the degree of population, or the fertility of soil, unless the faith of national engagements is placed upon a basis inviolable and immutable, the advantages of nature will be lost in the uncertainty of their enjoyment, and Government will afford no encouragement to industry or protection to virtue; but, while it oppresses with its power, must corrupt by its example. The domestic experience of America renders it unnecessary, indeed, to explore the annals of ancient or cotemporary nations, in order to collect this salutary lesson; and there is only wanting an exercise of that wisdom which it inculcates to convert her calamity into a blessing, and make the remembrance of what has been lost the instrument of securing what may yet be acquired. The decay of public credit, engendering licentiousness and anarchy, has once threatened the perversion of all that was noble in her exertions, and the waste of all that was valuable in her success. To avert a similar danger, the most unequivocal demonstration of an intention to restore the faith and purity of her name is naturally expected from the guardians of the public interest and honor. And your memorialists now fervently pray them to consider, that procrastination, in a business of so delicate a nature, may be as fatal as a defect of power, or a want of disposition to be just.

In the resources of the Union your memorialists discover an ample fund, and in the conduct of their fellow-citizens they perceive a fair and honorable desire to discharge the engagements which were incurred in the common cause. The only task, therefore, that seems to be imposed upon the present Government is, to adopt that mode which shall be best calculated to promote the public welfare, at the same time that it does justice to the individuals who are interested. Immediately to pay off the public debt, principal and interest, if not impracticable, would be greatly inconvenient, and is certainly unnecessary; for the example of those nations who enjoy the highest commercial reputation has evinced that a permanent appropriation for the punctual payment of the interest will enable the public creditor to enjoy, by the facility of a transfer, all the advantages of the principal, without injuring the credit of the country, or straining her resources.

Your memorialists, in addition to these observations, beg leave respectfully to suggest, that it has been the deliberate opinion of some of the most enlightened statesmen that a certain amount of funded debt (and surely the debt of the United States would not be deemed too great) is a national benefit. The creation of a new species of money by this means, naturally increases the circulation of cash, and extensively promotes every kind of useful undertaking and enterprise in agriculture, commerce, and mechanics. On this ground alone, therefore, the advantages of a funding system would be sufficient to justify its establishment; but there are other arguments arising from the political situation of America, which ought to render it, in this country particularly, an object of favor and attention. It has been well maintained that, after the revolution in England, a funding system was there encouraged as the best means of attaching the great and powerful body of stockholders to the Government. The policy which prevailed in that case is infinitely more forcible when applied to the case of the United States; for the credit of the Union being perfectly established, every citizen, who has not originally, will be desirous of becoming a proprietor in the public funds; those individuals who may hitherto have been inimical to the principles of the Revolution, or averse to the adoption of the existing Constitution, will be irresistibly invited to partake of the benefits, and consequently to promote the prosperity of the Confederation; each State will find an interest in the welfare and punctuality of the rest; the Federal Government will be zealously supported as a general guarantee; and, in short, a debt originating in the patriotism that achieved the independence, may thus be converted into a cement that shall strengthen and perpetuate the Union of America.

Your memorialists conceive that it would be superfluous to prosecute a detail of the immediate or collateral benefits which a funding system would produce, whether by stimulating domestic industry, or attracting foreign capitals to the aid of the husbandmen, merchants, and artists of America. It is enough, in this respect, to urge that justice, humanity, and policy require the earliest consideration of the claim which is now respectfully submitted. Nor can it be incumbent on your memorialists to obviate the suggestions of that pernicious policy which aims at once to plunder them of their only hope, and to undermine the foundations of an infant Government, even before the structure is complete. Let it not be recorded in the history of the Revolution, that, while the monarchy of Britain generously cherished and indemnified every friend to prerogative and usurpation, a triumphant Republic suffered the prompt and zealous supporters of the standard of liberty to languish in a sad and necessitous obscurity, to lament over those vouchers of property and service that tend at once to remind them of the equality which they formerly maintained among their fellow-citizens, to mark their present distress and penury, and to stigmatize the wanton ingratitude of their country.

When, indeed, it is considered that many of the members of your honorable body have also been affected by the destructive operations and expedients of the late war, and that all are in the actual enjoyment of that sovereignty which has been principally purchased by the personal exertions and voluntary aids of such as are denominated public creditors, it would be unjust to the feeling, integrity and gratitude of those whom they now address, were your memorialists for a moment to admit a supposition that a solemn appeal thus brought before you, in the name of so numerous a class of meritorious citizens, could be neglected or forgotten.

By the glorious remembrance, therefore, of the part which the rich prospect of the future; by the obligations which the representatives of the public owe to the struggling orphans and widows of those who have bravely fought the battles of the Union, or nobly supplied its wants in the times of peril and distress; and by the regard which is due to the peace and happiness of posterity; your petitioners implore your immediate aid and interposition, rejoicing that their humble solicitation for justice and humanity necessarily includes a prayer for the revival of public credit, and the advancement of the national honor.

PHILADELPHIA, August 21, 1789.

HOSPITAL FOR SEAMEN.

A bill providing for the establishment of hospitals for the relief of sick and disabled seamen, and prescribing the regulations for the harbors of the United States, was read the second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the whole House on the fifteenth of September next.

SALARIES OF EXECUTIVE OFFICERS.

The House, according to the order of the day, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for establishing the salaries of the Executive officers of Government, with their assistants and clerks; and after some time being spent therein, the committee rose, and reported that the committee had gone through the same, and made several amendments thereto; which were twice read, amended, and agreed to by the House; and the bill, with the amendments, were ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

COLLECTION OF REVENUE.

Mr. GOODHUE, from the committee appointed for the purpose, presented a bill to suspend part of an act to regulate the collection of duties imposed by law on the tonnage of ships or vessels, and on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States; which was received and read the first time.

After which the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, August 29.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they agreed to the amendments made by this House to the third and fifty-seventh amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill for registering and clearing vessels, regulating the coasting trade, and for other purposes.

An engrossed bill for establishing the salaries of the Executive officers of Government, with their assistants and clerks, was read the third time, and passed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Baldwin, Benson, Boudinot, Brown, Cadwalader, Gale, Goodhue, Griffin, Hartley, Heister, Jackson, Lawrence, Lee, Matthews, Moore, Scott, Sedgwick, Sherman, Sylvester, Smith, (of Maryland,) Smith, (of South Carolina,) Sturgis, Trumbull, Tucker, Wadsworth, and Wynkoop—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Coles, Floyd, Foster, Gerry, Grout, Hathorn, Livermore, Parker, Partridge, Van Rensselaer, Schureman, Sney, Sinnickson, Stone, Sumter, and Thatcher—16.

A petition from Abraham Westervelt was presented to the House and read, praying an exclusive patent may be given him for manufacturing shell buttons of different dimensions, the art of doing which he has lately discovered.

Also, a petition from sundry inhabitants of that part of the State of New Jersey, known by the name of East New Jersey, praying that the District Court of the United States, to be held within the said State, may be fixed at Perth Amboy, as a place most central and convenient to the inhabitants of the said State at large.

Ordered, That the said petitions do lie on the table.

THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. BOUNDINOT in the Chair.

Mr. LIVERMORE said, that he had before moved to strike out the whole section; but as he had spoken pretty largely on the subject when it was last before the House, he should say very little now; but the fate of this clause he apprehended, would determine the fate of the bill.

He wished Congress to establish State Courts of Admiralty, and reject this system, because it would be attended with great inconvenience and expense. The salaries of thirteen district judges, and the necessary buildings for their accommodation, is no inconsiderable saving to a people oppressed so severely by the burdens of the late war. But an objection, in my mind, of greater weight is, that you establish two jurisdictions in the same place. The bill proposes that the State courts shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts. Now under these two establishments debtors may be worried and distressed more than is necessary for the plain and simple administration of justice. A debtor may be in the custody of a State officer, or he may be committed to prison; at the same time there comes an officer from the Continental court, what is to be done with the unfortunate person? Is the man to be divided, that one half may appear in one court, and the other in another? Can you force the prison, and take him into other custody? or can you compel him to attend a court on the return of the writ, if he is not in your power? If this can be done, your system will furnish opportunities for collusion. A person may be in confinement for an actual debt sued in the State courts, when the marshal of the district shall wrest him out of the hands of the sheriff for a fictitious debt, intended to operate as a rescue. Perhaps gentlemen may think the same jail will answer for both; but you cannot have two keepers of the same jail, and one will refuse to obey a foreign authority. If these objections could be obviated, I should think more favorably of the bill. But, for my part, I cannot see how it is possible. We have supported the Union for thirteen or fourteen years without such courts, from which I infer that they are not necessary, or we should have discovered the inconvenience of being without them; yet I believe Congress have always had ample justice done in all their claims; at least, as I said before, I never heard any complaint, except the case of an appeal on a capture. Now, if we had a Supreme Court, to which appeals can be carried, and an Admiralty Court for deciding cases of a maritime nature, our system will be useful and complete. Why should we suppose that the administration of justice will not be continued with its wonted impartiality? Suppose a merchant gives a bond to pay one hundred dollars duty, can not that bond be recovered as well and speedily in the State courts, as in any Continental court whatever? But admitting the judges may be partial, will not the same jury be employed? The jurors must come from the vicinage, and in all probability the district judges will be composed of gentlemen who reside on the benches of the State courts. Now, in this case, it is the same to the Government to foregoers, and to citizens. But if a distinction is necessary, it can only be with respect to maritime affairs, dependent on the law of nations; and for this reason we mean to make a provision by instituting Courts of Admiralty. If justice cannot be had here, there will be an appeal to the Federal Supreme Court, which is all that can be required. Now, with respect to the expense of establishing these latter courts, it will not be a fiftieth part as much as the proposed institution, and its advantage and convenience will be a thousand times as great. The whole bill turns upon striking out this clause. If it is done, I intend to move one for the establishment of Courts of Admiralty, with some regulations respecting appeals.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina.—As much will depend on the determination of this question, it is necessary it should be well considered by all the committee. It will not be easy to alter the system when once established. The judges are to hold their commissions during good behaviour, and after they are appointed, they are only removable by impeachment; consequently this system must be a permanent one. The committee will not, therefore, determine that there shall be district courts until they have reflected seriously on the consequences attending their vote.

After this point is settled, the next which occurs is the extent of jurisdiction to be annexed to this court. This question is as important as the former; for it will be no less difficult than improper to enlarge or curtail the jurisdiction of a court already established.

With respect to the first point, it seems generally conceded that there ought to be a district court of some sort. The Constitution, indeed, recognises such a court, because it speaks of "such inferior courts as the Congress shall establish;" and because it gives to the Supreme Court only appellate jurisdiction in most cases of a federal nature. But some gentlemen are of opinion that the district court should be altogether confined to admiralty causes; while others deem it expedient that it should be entrusted with a more enlarged jurisdiction; and should, in addition to admiralty causes, take cognizance of all causes seizure on land, all breaches of impost laws, of offences committed on the high seas, and causes in which foreigners or citizens of other States are parties. The committee are now to decide between these two opinions. After mature reflection, I am inclined to favor the latter. What are the objections advanced against it? A gentleman from New Hampshire has observed, that such an establishment will be unnecessary, expensive, and disagreeable to our constituents. Justice, he observed, could be as well administered in the State as in the district courts; and should the State courts betray any symptoms of partiality, their adjudications would be subject to revision in the Federal Supreme Court, which, in his opinion, afforded sufficient security. If the State courts are to take cognizance of those causes which, by the Constitution are declared to belong to the judicial courts of the United States, an appeal must lie in every case to the latter, otherwise the judicial authority of the Union might be altogether frustrated. To deny such an appeal, would be to frustrate the most important objects of the Federal Government, and would obstruct its operations. The necessity of uniformity in the decision of the Federal courts is obvious; to assimilate the principles of national decisions, and collect them, as it were, into one focus, appeals from all the State courts to the Supreme Court would be indispensable. It is, however, much to be apprehended that this constant control of the Supreme Federal Court over the adjudication of the State courts, would dissatisfy the people, and weaken the importance and authority of the State judges. Nay, more, it would lessen their respectability in the eyes of the people, even in causes which properly appertain to the State jurisdictions; because the people, being accustomed to see their decrees overhauled and annulled by a superior tribunal, would soon learn to form an irreverent opinion of their importance and abilities. It appears, therefore, expedient to separate, as much as possible, the State from the Federal jurisdiction, to draw a broad line of distinction, to assign clearly to each its precise limits, and to prevent a clashing or interference between them. The expense is suggested as an objection to this system. It is admitted by the gentlemen who makes it, that it is proper to have District Courts of Admirality. These courts must, of necessity, have jurisdiction of offences committed on the high seas. Now the establishment of such a court will induce nearly all the expense that will be requisite; the extension of the system to the length I have stated will occasion a very trifling increase of the expense; and if, after due consideration, it should be found that the latter plan would be more conducive to the happiness and welfare of our constituents than the other, a small increase of the expense ought to be no impediment to the attainment of so valuable an object.

There can be no reason why our constituents should be displeased with the arrangement; the district judge will be elected from among the citizens of the State where he is to exercise his functions, and will feel every inducement to promote the happiness and protect the liberties of his fellow-citizens. He will be more independent than the State judges, holding his commission during good behaviour, and not influenced by the fear of a diminution of his salary. Trial by jury will be secured in all cases wherein it is provided in the State courts. Should the district judge be under any bias, it is reasonable to suppose it would be rather in favor of his fellow-citizens than in favor of foreigners, or the United States. By restricting the State courts to few causes of federal jurisdiction, the number of appeals will be diminished, because every cause tried in those courts will, for the reasons before mentioned, be subject to appeal; whereas the jurisdiction of the district court will be final in many cases. Inasmuch, therefore, as those appeals are grievous to the citizens, which lie from a court within their own State to the Supreme Court at the seat of Government, and at a great distance, they will consequently be benefited by an exemption from them. In the bill, as sent from the Senate, the jurisdiction of the district courts is not so extensive as to occasion any just alarm; it is, in my opinion, rather too confined, and does not embrace objects enough. It would be difficult to take from that court any of its jurisdiction without materially injuring the whole judicial system, except the clause relating to consuls and vice-consuls, which appears to me to be improperly annexed to the district court, and which I shall move to strike out, when we come to that part of the bill. But to what objects do the district courts extend? To admiralty causes and trials for piracy committed on the high seas. Gentlemen have conceded that the district courts shall have jurisdiction of these cases—to offences against the United States.

It is very proper that a court in the United States should try offences committed against the United States. Every nation upon earth punishes by its own courts offences against its own laws. To seizures on land for breaches of the revenue laws, this power will not be censured; it would be felo de se to trust the collection of the revenue of the United States to the State jurisdictions. The disinclination of the judges to carry the law into effect, their disapprobation of a certain duty, the rules of the court, or other obvious causes, might delay or frustrate the collection of the revenue, and embarrass the National Government. From this view, it appears that the district court is not clothed with any authority of which the State courts are stripped, but is barely provided with that authority which arises out of the establishment of a National Government, and which is indispensably necessary for its support. Can the State courts at this moment take cognizance of offences committed on the high seas? If they do, it is under an act of Congress, giving them jurisdiction; and, in such cases, the Judge of the Admiralty is associated with two common law judges: this tribunal becomes then a federal court for the particular occasion, because it is established by Congress. The State courts have no jurisdiction of causes arising from a national impost law, because no such law heretofore existed. Where, then, is the ground of uneasiness suggested by gentlemen? The foregoing observations must persuade them that their alarms have been premature. But it is said that there must be court-houses, judges, marshals, clerks, constables, jails, and gibbets; that these establishments will occasion a heavy and unnecessary burden, and have a tendency to create disgust in the people.

I readily agree with the gentleman that there are in every community some individuals who will see, with pain, every new institution in the shape of a constable, jail, or gibbet, and who think that law and courts are an abridgment of their liberty: but I should be very sorry to concur with him that this is a prevailing opinion. I think better of our constituents, and am persuaded they are sensible that those institutions are necessary for the protection of their lives and property; and grow out of the very nature of a federal Government. Care, indeed, should be taken to prevent their being grievous and oppressive; but as long as knaves and rogues exist in the world, and monsters, under the form of men, preying upon the innocent, so long will courts and all their concomitants be wanted to redress the wrongs of the latter, and repress the depredations of the former. But let me ask the gentleman whether a Court of Admiralty and a court for the trial of offences on the high seas, which he agrees ought to be established, will not require all these institutions, viz: court-houses, clerks, sheriffs, &c.? There can be no doubt of it. The extension of the jurisdiction of the district court, as far as I think it necessary, will not occasion any one article of expense, or any one institution that will not be necessary on the gentleman's plan. To suppose that there will be a clashing of jurisdiction between the State and district courts on all occasions, by having a double set of officers, is to suppose the States will take a pleasure in thwarting the Federal Government; it is a supposition not warranted by our fellow-citizens, who, finding that these establishments were created for their benefit and protection, will rather promote than obstruct them; it is a supposition equally opposed to the power of direct taxation, and to the establishment of State and county courts which exist in the several States, and are productive of no such inconvenience. These several courts will have their limits defined, and will move within their respective orbits without any danger of deviation. Besides, I am not persuaded that there will be a necessity for having separate court-houses and jails; those already provided in the several States will be made use of by the district courts. I remember when the court for the trial of piracy, under the authority of Congress, was held at Charleston, the judges sat in the court-house; the prisoners were confined in the jail, were under the custody of the constable, and were executed by the orders of the sheriff of the district of Charleston. All these were State institutions, and yet the court was a federal court.

There is another important consideration; that is, how far the Constitution stands in the way of this motion. It is declared by that instrument that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme, and in such inferior courts as Congress shall from time to time establish. Here is no discretion, then, in Congress to vest the judicial power of the United States in any other than the Supreme Court and the inferior courts of the United States. It is further declared that the judicial power of the United States shall extend to all cases of a particular description. How is that power to be administered? Undoubtedly by the tribunals of the United States; if the judicial power of the United States extends to those specified cases, it follows indisputably that the tribunals of the United States must likewise extend to them. What is the object of the motion? To assign the jurisdiction of some of these very cases to the State courts, to judges who, in many instances, hold their places for a limited period; whereas, the Constitution, for the greater security of the citizen, and to insure the independence of the federal judges, has expressly declared that they shall hold their commissions during good behaviour; to judges who are exposed every year to a diminution of salary by the State Legislatures; whereas, the Constitution, to remove from the federal judges all dependence on the Legislative or Executive, has protected them from any diminution of their compensation. Whether the expediency or the unconstitutionality of the motion be considered, there are more than sufficient reasons to oppose it. The district court is necessary, if we intend to adhere to the Constitution, and to carry the Government into effect. At the same time, I shall cheerfully assist in organizing this court in that mode, which will prevent its being grievous or oppressive, and will render it conducive to the protection and happiness of our constituents.

Mr. Jackson said he conceived this to be the most important business that had as yet come before the House. It was what he had long considered, and had with difficulty decided, but upon mature consideration was impressed with the same sentiments as the gentleman from New Hampshire. It must be admitted that a society was formed before the rules that governed that on his lawsuit; he must sink under the oppression of his richer neighbor. He was clearly of opinion that the people would much rather have but one appeal, which, he conceived, would answer every purpose; he meant from the State courts immediately to the Supreme Court of the continent. An Admiralty court of jurisdiction he would grant might be necessary for the trial of maritime affairs, and matters relative to the revenue; and which object he would cheerfully enlarge it; and thought for the present it would be far more eligible. The gentleman has likewise advanced that the expense would be as great without as with the inferior jurisdiction. He would beg leave to differ with him, and declared that it would be in the proportion of three to one; for although the clerk and marshal of the district courts are the officers proposed for the circuit courts, yet there would arise a train of inferior officers, exclusive of jurors, witnesses, &c. He has likewise advanced that it would be necessary to prevent confusion; the line of distinction would be much easier preserved in the present state of the department, for many of the reasons pointed out by the gentleman from New Hampshire, exclusive of the difficulty of making new rules. But we are told, he said, it is necessary that every Government should have the power of executing its own laws. This argument would likewise fail, when we find that the Constitution, treaties, and laws of the United States are, by the Constitution itself, made the supreme laws of the land. Are not the judges of the different States bound by oath to support that supreme law? Will they not recollect those oaths, and be liable to punishment by your act, which has obliged them to take that oath, if they do not respect it as such? Assuredly they will; it is part of the compact formed with the States. But does there not remain the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to control them, and bring them to their reason? Can they not reverse or confirm the State decrees, as they may find them right or wrong? Consequently this last argument falls to the ground.

That the system is vexatious can be easily proved, and is too obvious. An offender is dragged from his house, friends and connexions, to a distant spot, where he is deprived of every advantage of former character, of relations and acquaintance; the right of trial by a jury of the vicinage is done away, and perhaps he is carried to a place where popular clamor might for the moment decide against him; or, if allowed a trial by vicinage, or his neighbors, it is equally vexatious to drag him two or three hundred miles from his home, with evidences to try and give testimony at a distant place; every thing is to be dreaded from it. This, he observed, was contrary to our wonted customs, and we need but revert to the history of Britain, after the Conquest, to view what struggles that nation made against innovations of this nature. The monkish clergy joined with the kings to oppress the people, to establish civil law, and get the legal power into their own hands; the people took the alarm, and with the nobility contested the point, which was never finally settled until the great charter of John, which it was one of the causes of producing, and that fired the ecclesiastical bounds. He would ask if our modes of trial must not be as dear to our fellow-citizens as theirs were to them, and if the same commotions may not be reasonably expected? He feared they would be found so. Is it proper we should be so suspicious of the State judges? He could not, he said, for his part, consider human nature so depraved, as to suppose that, with an oath to observe the supreme law of the land, the State judges would not obey it. In his opinion, it became us, as a wise Legislature, to take up and execute the least exceptionable and milder mode first. There was no requisition, no necessity from the Constitution. If, on experiment, it should be found (and the House generally admits our laws are at present experimental) that sufficient attention is not paid, and that but Government requires for its existence a more energetic mode, he pledged himself to agree to any inferior jurisdictions that may be thought necessary for that purpose; but he never could consent to oppress his fellow-citizens without being taught by absolute necessity arising from experience.

Mr. Benson said, if the House decided in favor of the present question, it would involve a total abandonment of the judicial power, excepting those cases the honorable gentlemen mean to provide for, namely, the Courts of Admiralty and Supreme Courts. The honorable gentleman had observed that difficulties would arise out of the proposed establishments; but these difficulties or embarrassments are not to be charged to the House, they grow out of the Constitution itself. The gentlemen suppose that two sovereign and independent authorities can never be exercised over the same territory; but this is not the business of the committee; they could not get rid of these difficulties by retrenching their powers; they must carry the Constitution into effect. The gentleman has stated a case, in supposing that process shall issue from the State and continental courts, and both be served upon the defendant at the same time, and then asks what is to be done. Is the man to be divided? Now, in return, he would ask the same question; is the United States to abandon all its powers and jurisdiction, because the exercise of it may be attended with some inconvenience? As well might we ask individual States to abandon theirs, because there is some clashing with the Federal Judiciary. He apprehended that neither were to be abandoned, but that they should endeavor to administer both with as little inconvenience to either as was practicable.

It is not left to the election of the Legislature of the United States whether we adopt or not a judicial system like the one before us; the words in the Constitution are plain and full, and must be carried into operation. He would not undertake to say that it was the best system that could be formed; but it had its advantages over some in which the honorable gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. Livermore) had said that justice was well administered; he thought there was more reliance on judges who were appointed during good behaviour, than on others appointed from session to session, and ever dependent on the will of the State Legislatures.

He left it to experience to show whether the Judiciary would interfere or not; some gentlemen had predicted they would; it was possible that they might, and he did not know but that the interference would be of such a delicate nature, as to compel the United States to relinquish her portion; or, on the other hand, the States individually might consent that the judicial power should be solely exercised by the Union. But all this was wide of the question; the House had nothing more to do than to perform their duty, and carry the Constitution into full operation.

Mr. Snowick said, the gentleman would find as many difficulties growing out of the substitute as those he apprehended from the plan on the table. He had asked what will be done with the prisoners if they are taken at the same time in consequence of processes from the National and State courts? I answer by asking him, what will be done with the prisoners if they are taken at the same time by a process from the Admiralty and State courts? The other difficulties he had apprehended were well replied to by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina; and I shall only remark, that we are so circumstanced that two distinct independent powers of judicial proceedings must exist; at least I do not see how we shall get rid of the difficulty, if it is one, until there shall be a change in the Constitution.

I did not suppose it was a question at this day, whether this Government is to exercise all the powers of a Government or not. I did conceive, sir, that such an idea could exist in the mind of any gentleman; yet what is the object of the present motion? Sir, it goes to divest the Government of one of its most essential branches; if this is destroyed, your Constitution is but the shadow of a Government.

Is it not essential that a Government possess within itself the power necessary to carry its laws into execution? But the honorable gentleman proposes to leave this business to a foreign authority, totally independent of this Legislature, whether our ordinances shall have efficacy or not. Would this be prudent, even if it were in our power? Suppose a State Government was inimical to the Federal Government, and its judges were attached to the same local policy, they might refuse or neglect to attend to the national business; they might be corrupt, and in either case the public might sustain an essential injury. And where would be your redress? Shall we apply to the State Legislatures that patronize them? Can we impeach or have them tried? If we can, how is the trial to be had; before a tribunal established by the State? Can we expect in this way to bring them to justice? Surely no gentleman supposes we can. These are not chimerical suppositions; they are founded in nature and such as may be expected; indeed, facts have already occurted to prove to us how dangerous it would be to make the State Legislatures the sole guardians of the national faith and honor. Already have the United States been hurled down by those arms from a pinnacle of glory to the lowest state of degradation. The United States, after a glorious and successful struggle, in which they displayed valor and patriotism astonishing the Old World, secured their independence! and a single concession was the price of an honorable peace. The discharge of bona fide debts due from the citizens of America to the subjects of Britain was all that Britain required. Now, is it not obvious to every man, that this honorable stipulation ought by all means to be considered the supreme law of the land? Yet, what was the event? State after State, Legislature after Legislature, made laws and regulations in positive opposition to the treaty; and the State judiciaries could not, or did not, decide contrary to their State ordinances. What have been the consequences of these proceedings? It ill becomes me at this time, when we hope to wipe off every ignominious stain, to recapitulate the evils it has drawn down upon the nation. But I hope they are sufficiently notorious to put us on our guard against trusting essential powers out of our hands, contrary to our duty, and contrary to the wishes of the people.

When we are certain that the Government cannot be organized without establishing its judicial tribunals; when we fear for its existence, (at least its existing with reputation and dignity,) unless we provide for the due execution of national laws and national treaties; shall we forego them because gentlemen apprehend some small difficulties from interfering process? Sir, it has been already demonstrated that the interference will be trifling, if any; it will be too small to authorize us to blast the expected benefits arising from a complete and efficient system of government.

Mr. Ames said, the remarks made by gentlemen on the importance of this question would be of some utility in deciding it. The judicial power is, in fact, highly important to the Government, and to the people; to the Government, because by this means its laws are peaceably carried into execution. We know, by experience, what a wretched system that is which is divested of this power. We see the difference between a treaty which independent nations make, and a law which is not be enforced without war, and a law which is the will of the society. A refractory individual is made to feel the weight of the whole community. A Government that may make but cannot enforce laws, cannot last long, nor do much good. By the power, too, the people are gainers. The administration of justice is the very performance of the social bargain on the part of Government. It is the reward of their toils; the equivalent for what they grant. They have to plant, to water, to manure the tree, and this is the fruit of it. The argument, therefore, a priori, is strong against the motion; for while it weakens the Government, it defrauds the people. We live in a time of innovation; but until miracles shall become more common than ordinary events, and surprise us less than the usual course of nature, he should think it a wonderful felicity of invention to propose the expedient of hiring out our judicial power, and employing courts not amenable to our laws, instead of instituting them ourselves as the Constitution requires. We might with as great propriety negotiate and assign over our legislative as our judicial power; and it would not be more strange to get the laws made for this body, than after their passage to get them interpreted and executed by those whom we do not appoint, and cannot control. The field of debate is wide; the time for consideration had been so ample, and that remaining for debate so short, that he would not enter fully into it. The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Smith) had very ably proved the expediency of the motion. He would confine himself, he said, to another point; and if it could be established, it would narrow the discussion.

The branches of the judicial power of the United States are the admiralty jurisdiction, the criminal jurisdiction, cognizance of certain common law cases, and of such as may be given by the statutes of Congress. The Constitution, and the laws made in pursuance of it, are the supreme laws of the land. They prescribe a rule of action for individuals. If it is disputed whether an act done is right or wrong, reference must be had to this rule; and whether the action is compared with the rule of action in a State or Federal court, it is equally wrong, or that wrong is right. If a man is restrained of his liberty, and for that sues the officer of the General Government in a State court, the defendant shows that he was a marshal, and served a precept according to the law of the United States; then he must be cleared, otherwise the law of the United States would not be the law of the land. But there is a substantial difference between the jurisdiction of the courts and the rules of decision.

In the latter case the court has only to inquire into facts and the rules of action prescribed to individuals. In the former they do not inquire how but what they may try. The jurisdiction of the court is the depositum of a truth. The supreme power in a State is the fountain of justice. Such streams are derived from this fountain to the courts as the Legislature may positively enact. The judges, as servants to the public, can do that only for which they are employed. The Constitution had provided how this trust should be designated. The judges must be named by their Christian and surnames, commissioned during good behaviour, and have salaries. Causes of exclusive Federal cognizance cannot be tried otherwise, nor can the judicial power of the United States be otherwise exercised. The State courts were not supposed to be deprived by the Constitution of the jurisdiction that they exercised before, over many causes that may be tried now in the national courts. The suitors would have their choice of courts. But who shall try a crime against a law of the United States, or a new created action? Here jurisdiction is made de novo. A trust is to be exercised, and this can be done only by persons appointed as judges in the manner before mentioned. The will of the society is expressed and is disobeyed; and who shall interpret and enforce that will but the persons invested with authority from the same society? The State Judges are to judge according to the law of the United States, and the common law, but no authority for them. It controlled their decisions, but could not enlarge their powers. Suppose an action was brought on a statute, declaring a forfeiture equal to the whole of the goods against him whoever shall unlade without a permit; before the law was made, no court had jurisdiction. Could a State court sustain such an action? They might as properly assume admiralty jurisdiction, or sustain actions for forfeitures of the British revenue acts. He did not mean any disrespect to the State courts. In some of the States, he knew the judges were highly worthy of trust; that they were safeguards to Government, and ornaments to human nature. But whence should they get the power of trying the supposed action? The States under whom they act, and to whom they are amenable, never had such power to give, and this Government never gave them any. Individuals may be commanded, but are we authorized to require the servants of the States to serve us? It was not only true, he said, that they could not decide this cause, if a provision was neglected to be made, by creating proper tribunals for the decision, but they would not be authorized to do it, even if an act was passed declaring that they should be vested with power; for they must be individually commissioned and salaried to have it constitutionally, and then they would not have it as the State judges. If we may empower one State court, suppose the Supreme Court, we may empower all or any, even the justices of the peace. This will appear more monstrous if we consider the trial of crimes. A statute creates an offence. Shall any justice of the peace be directed to summon a jury to try for treason or piracy? It was true the Government would not direct a thing so wickedly absurd to be done; but who will believe Government may lawfully do it? It would be tedious to pursue this, or even the ideas connected with it, very far. The nature of the subject rendered it difficult to be even perspicuous without being prolix. His wish was to establish the conclusion, that offences against statutes of the United States, and actions, the cognizance whereof is created de novo, are exclusively of Federal jurisdiction; that no persons should act as judges to try them, except such as may be commissioned agreeably to the Constitution; that for the trial of such offences and causes, tribunals must be created. These, with the admiralty jurisdiction, which it is agreed must be provided for, constitute the principal powers of the district courts. If judges must be paid, they might as well be employed. The remnants of jurisdiction, which may be taken away, are scarcely worth transferring to the State courts, and may as well be exercised by our own.

The question being now called for from several parts of the House,

Mr. STONE said, he hoped the question would not be determined on the discussion it already had. He thought, although gentlemen might have made up their minds on this subject, a very full communication of the principles upon which they acted in this momentous business ought to take place before the question was decided; for to him it appeared of the greatest importance that they should act rightly, and it should be known they acted on right principles. It is admitted, said he, on all hands, to be a work of extreme difficulty; one gentleman has said that it is so difficult, we cannot correct it. But surely we ought to exercise a little patience in the examination; perhaps, on a minute inquiry, we may hear of some road by which we may avoid these difficulties, and amply recompense ourselves, our constituents, and our posterity, for the expense of our time. I confess, for my own part, I wish more information than I have yet received, in order to reconcile me to the bill. I was so unfortunate on a former and memorable occasion as to differ from a majority of this House; perhaps this question may turn upon a similar principle, and renew that pain which it gives me to oppose what I find to be the voice of my country. I therefore most earnestly wish to be convinced that my ideas are founded on misconception, in order to go with the majority; but if I should be left in the minority, whether from not having my difficulties removed, or because they are insuperable, I shall ever cheerfully submit to the judgment of the House; and on this occasion I am ready to assent to every power necessary to the due administration of the Government. But I declare, in my mind, this is a system founded on principles distinct and separate from the general principles upon which the Constitution was framed. It appears to me that the present Government originated in necessity, and it ought not to be carried further than necessity will justify.

I believe the scheme of the present Government was considered by those who framed it as dangerous to the liberties of America; if they had not considered it in this point of view, they would not have guarded it in the manner they have done. They supposed that it had a natural tendency to destroy the State Governments; or, on the other hand, they supposed that the State Governments had a tendency to abridge the powers of the General Government; therefore it was necessary to guard against either taking place, and this was to be done properly by establishing a Judiciary for the United States. This Judiciary was likewise absolutely necessary, because a great many purposes of the Union could not be accomplished by the States, from the principle of their government, and could not be executed from a defect in their power. But all these, I presume, are involved in the jurisdiction of the Supreme Federal Court. I apprehend in every thing else the State courts might have had complete and adequate jurisdiction; the State courts could not determine between State and State, because their judgment would be ineffectual; they could never carry it into execution. But I apprehend in all other cases the States could execute that authority which is reposed in the United States. Yet I do not doubt but the caution might be necessary for securing to the General Government, in reserve, those very powers, because such abuses may happen in the State courts, as to render it necessary for the due administration of justice that the national jurisdiction be carried over such States. But what I am not satisfied of is, whether it is now essential that we proceed to make such establishments. I cannot conceive it to be now essential; because the business may be done without, and it is not commanded by the Constitution; if it is commanded by the Constitution, we have no power to restrain or modify it. If it is the right of an alien or foreigner to sue or be sued only in the courts of the United States, then they have a right to that jurisdiction complete, and then Congress must institute courts for taking exclusive cognizance of all cases pointed out in the Constitution; but this would be contrary to the principle of the bill, which proposes to establish inferior courts with concurrent jurisdiction with the State courts.

By the Constitution, Congress has a right to establish such inferior courts as they from time to time shall think necessary. If I understand the force of the words "from time to time," it is that Congress may establish such courts when they think proper. I take it they have used another precaution; and this construction is guarded by another clause in the Constitution, where it is provided that the Constitution itself, and all laws made in pursuance thereof, as well as treaties, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State are to be bound thereby; any thing in the State laws or constitutions to the contrary notwithstanding. Now can gentlemen be afraid that the State courts will not decide according to the supreme law? If they are, it is in the discretion of Congress to refuse them the opportunity; but the bill gives them a concurrent jurisdiction, and shows that these dangers are not really apprehended; if they give them concurrent jurisdiction, they have the power of giving them complete; and they may delay from time to time the institution of national courts, until they suppose or have experienced the inadequacy of the State courts to the objects granted by the Constitution to the participation of the Judiciary of the United States. If, sir, the State judges are bound to take cognizance of the laws of the United States, and are sworn to support the General Government, the system before us must have originated from a source different from that from which the Government itself derived its existence. Yet, I admit, sir, that there is a necessity for instituting Admiralty courts, though it is not because I consider the power of the State inadequate to that object; but because those courts are not instituted in all of them, and it is proper that there should be a maritime jurisdiction within the bounds of every State to determine cases arising within the same. It depends not upon the principle, but on the fact, that I admit it to be necessary for Congress to organize an admiralty system; for I take it, that were admiralty courts established in the different States, and were you to make laws that affected admiralty cases, they would be as much obliged to determine by your laws as if you had instituted the courts yourselves. If, then, the State courts have the power, your system is not necessary, unless they will not execute that power; it must therefore depend on your suspicion of their want of judgment or integrity. I declare I can contemplate a time, with great pain, when one of those cases may happen; but I believe the time is not yet arrived, and we ought not to adopt a system which presupposes it.

Judiciary.

I know it is of great importance to have the decisions of the courts conformable; and I believe also it is of no inconsiderable importance to the Government, to have it operate as well on individuals as on States. It would be, if liked by the people, one of the strongest chains by which the Union is bound; one of the strongest cements for making this Constitution firm and compact. But I would not have the measure adopted at a time, and on a principle, which must have a direct contrary tendency. If we establish Federal courts, on the principle that the State courts are not able or willing to do their duty, we establish rivals. But if we honestly conduct upon the principle of the Constitution—necessity, we may expect some good to result from the exercise of our powers, and prevent any clashing of jurisdiction; but to act on other principles must introduce confusion. Every body knows with what phlegmatic and cool determination, with what disregard of surrounding objects, courts maintain their separate jurisdictions. If we search the history of courts with which we are well acquainted, we shall find, that though they did not absolutely proceed to bloodshed, yet they put the whole community in commotion with the clashing of their jurisdictions; yet in that country the citizen and the community have a remedy. I fancy it is not so in this; I believe, instead of being found what the gentleman from South Carolina has termed them, planets rolling in their orbits, on the immutable principles of order, so as not to interfere with each other, they will be felt in concussion, and their violence will violate the harmony with which gentlemen please their imagination. The clew of separate jurisdiction will twine into such a state of perplexity, as to render it impossible for human wisdom to disentangle it without injury.

The gentlemen have mentioned jails and different processes; they might have traced it down to an execution, and shown us what might have been the consequence. Suppose an alien has a right to a man's property, and a citizen the same, they lay their executions at the same time, the jurisdictions do not know each other, they take no cognizance of each other's proceedings, the land is taken by the State court, and the possessor turned out; if it is taken by the officer of the Continental court, the possessor is turned out also, and an action is brought to determine again who has a right to the property; the State court says the citizen, and the Continental court the alien: What is to be done? Here is no tribunal to determine between them; it can only be determined by the sword. Gentlemen ought to examine this part of the subject more fully before they decide it.

Mr. BUNDS declared it to be a singular innovation on the privileges of the citizens, and such as they would never submit to; for they never had an idea that by this revolution they were to be put in a worse situation than they were under the former Government. He said when their State district courts would be sitting, the Federal courts would be engaged at the same time, and he asked whether the people could ever consider such an accumulation of courts of justice calculated to promote their interests? It would harass them with extreme duty, as witnesses, jurors, &c. and leave them at the mercy of the judges as to fines, when they should be engaged at another court. With respect to the time of the court sitting, it might be made at a most inconvenient time of the year, and the place might be at the most distant part of the State, where a man might be dragged three or four hundred miles from his home, and tried by men who know nothing of him, or he of them; he was sure, under such circumstances, the freemen of America could never submit to it.

Mr. MADISON said that all these points might be secured in the bill, when they came to the part that related thereto.

Mr. LAWRENCE expressed himself against the motion for striking out, because he conceived that it was essential to carry this part of the Constitution into effect, and that the courts had better be established now than hereafter.

Mr. MADISON said, it would not be doubted that some Judiciary system was necessary to accomplish the objects of the Government, and that it ought to be commensurate with the other branches of the Government. Under the late confederation, it could scarcely be said that there was any real Legislative power—there was no Executive branch, and the Judiciary was so confined as to be of little consequence; in the new Constitution a regular system is provided; the Legislative power is made effective for its objects; the Executive is co-extensive with the Legislature, and it is equally proper that this should be the case with the Judiciary. If the latter be concurrent with the State jurisdictions, it does not follow that it will for that reason be impracticable. It is admitted that a concurrence exists in some cases between the Legislative authorities of the Federal and State Governments; and it may be safely affirmed that there is more, both of novelty and difficulty in that arrangement, than there will be in the other.

To make the State courts Federal courts, is liable to insuperable objections, not to repeat that the moment that is done, they will, from the highest down to the county courts, hold their tenures during good behaviour, by virtue of the Constitution. It may be remarked, that, in another point of view, it would violate the Constitution by usurping a prerogative of the Supreme Executive of the United States. It would be making appointments which are expressly vested in that department, not indeed by nomination, but by description, which would amount to the same thing.

But laying these difficulties aside, a review of the constitution of the courts in many States will satisfy us that they cannot be trusted with the execution of the Federal laws. In some of the States, it is true, they might, and would be safe and proper organs of such a jurisdiction; but in others they are so dependent on State Legislatures, that to make the Federal laws dependent on them, would throw us back into all the embarrassments which characterized our former situation. In Connecticut the Judges are appointed annually by the Legislature, and the Legislature is itself the last resort in civil cases.

In Rhode Island, which we hope soon to see united with the other States, the case is at least as bad. In Georgia, even under their former constitution, the Judges are triennially appointed, and in a manner by no means unexceptionable. In Pennsylvania they hold their places for seven years only. Their tenures leave a dependence, particularly for the last year or two of the term, which forbid a reliance on Judges who feel it. With respect to their salaries, there are few States, if any, in which the Judges stand on independent ground. On the whole, he said, he did not see how it could be made compatible with the Constitution, or safe to the Federal interests, to make a transfer of the Federal jurisdiction to the State courts, as contended for by the gentlemen who oppose the clause in question.

Mr. BURKE said he had turned himself about to find some way to extricate himself from this measure; but which ever way he turned, the Constitution still stared him in the face, and he confessed he saw no way to avoid the evil. He made this candid confession to let them know why he should be a silent spectator of the progress of the bill; and he had not the most distant hope that the opposition would succeed. If any substitute could be devised that was not contrary to the Constitution, it should have his support, but he absolutely despaired of finding any. He was, however, satisfied that the people would feel its inconvenience, and express their dislike to a judicial system which rendered them insecure in their liberties and property; a system that must be regarded with jealousy and distrust.

Mr. JACKSON.—Sir, the importance of the question induces me to trouble the committee so far as to answer one of the arguments made use of in the opposition, and which I think necessary, to do away the impressions they have made, should be answered. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. SPENCER) has carried the nation to the highest pinnacle of glory, and in a moment hurled it down to the lowest pitch; and has laid the loss of national faith, credit, and honor, to the want of an energetic Judiciary. Every good citizen will, with him, deplore the abject state we have been brought to; but, sir, does this argument hold good here? I am of opinion it is evident it does not. Under the old form of Government, Congress had no compelling Judiciary; no power of reversing the decrees of the State Judges; but it is contended that they have, or ought to have more under the present system. It is allowed, sir, that Congress shall have the power, in its fullest extent, to correct, reverse, or affirm, any decree of a State court; and assuredly the Supreme Court will exercise this power. How then can our national faith or honor be injured by striking out the clause in future? It must be obvious to the gentleman himself, that his fears are groundless; for the Supreme Court will interfere and keep the State Judiciaries within their bounds: That authority will tell them, thus far ye shall go, and no further: and will bring them back when they exceed their bounds, to the principles of their institution.

Another gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. AINS) has advanced a position. I cannot agree with. He has said, that the State courts will not, nor cannot, take cognizance of the laws of the Union, as it would be taking up matters out of the bounds of their jurisdiction, and interfering with what was not left to them. Sir, I answer that gentleman with the words of the Constitution: This Constitution, and the laws of the United States, made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties, &c., shall be the supreme law of the land." This surpasses in power any State laws; the Judges are bound to notice them as the supreme law, and I call upon the gentleman to know, as a professional man, if a criminal was tried for a capital offence under a State law, and could justify himself under the laws of the Union, if the State Judges could condemn him? Sir, if they would forfeit their oaths if he was not acquitted; this, however, he has admitted in his argument in some measure. If there was no jurisdiction, neither could they notice the law. I acknowledge that the gentleman has used many specious arguments, but as they rest chiefly on this ground, I think they are done away.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. MASON) has advanced, that, by leaving this power in the hands of the State Judiciaries, or by joining their concurrent authority, you establish them as inferior jurisdictions. If the gentleman will turn to the eleventh and twenty-fifth sections, he will find those positions established, and what fell from the gentleman from Massachusetts concerning jurisdiction is likewise answered. The State courts, by the former, are acknowledged to have concurrent jurisdiction in a large extent, where the United States and an alien are the party, or between citizens of one State and those of another. And if the jurisdiction is acknowledged in some points, it must be supposed to be so in the fullest extent. By the twenty-fifth, sir, they are again fully established; and therefore they are now, by the present system, in every light as fully, agreeably to the gentleman's argument, inferior jurisdictions, as they possibly could be by the principles of the gentleman from New Hampshire. And here, sir, I will advert to the general arguments, used by the gentlemen in opposition, of the necessity of power to enforce the laws of the Union, and support the national existence and honor. Sir, I am opposed in some degree to this clause. For the extent of its power, even supposing the District and Circuit courts abolished, swallows up every shadow of a State Judiciary. Gentlemen, therefore, have no reason to complain of the want of Federal Judiciary power, for the clause declares, "That a final judgment or decree in any suit, in the highest court of law or equity of a State in which the decision of a treaty is drawn in question, or statute thereof, or an authority exercised under the United States; and the decision is against their validity; or where is drawn in question the validity of a statute, or an authority exercised under any State on the ground of their laws of the United States, and the decision is in favor of such their validity; or where is drawn in question the construction of any clause of the Constitution, or of a treaty or statute, or of a commission, held under the United States, and the decision is against the title, right, privilege, or exemption specially set up, or claimed by either party under such clause of the said Constitution, treaty, statute, or commission, may be re-examined and reversed, or affirmed in the Supreme Court of the United States." Sir, in my opinion, and I am convinced experience will prove it, there will not, neither can there be any suit or action brought in any State courts, but may, under this clause, be reversed or affirmed by being brought within the cognizance of the Supreme Court. But should there be some exceptions for the present, yet, sir, the precedent is so forcible, for it goes so far as even to admit of constructions on some of the articles, that by some means or other those articles will in time be totally lost. Sir, let us look at the Court of Exchequer in England: revenue trials at first engrossed its whole attention; from a series of fiction there is now no personal action but from construction may be brought within their cognizance. It is only a suggestion, and very seldom true, that a plaintiff is a king's debtor, and that the action is well grounded: yet there they have counter checks, and another resort; here the Supreme Court is final. Sir, the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. BURKE) was right in declaring a resident on Lake Erie might be dragged to New York for trial, or one on the Oconee to Savannah. Nay, sir, I know not how far in time a man might not be dragged; perhaps from the Oconee to be tried in North Carolina; for one part of the bill, without specifying the spot, declares, that the Circuit courts shall have power to hold special sessions for the trial of criminal causes at their discretion. On these considerations, I hope the House will not adopt the present system, until the milder one is tried. It is calculated to foment and harass the people, without answering any essential purpose.

Mr. SHERMAN said, it was admitted, on all hands, that a Judiciary system was necessary even upon condition that the Legislature had a discretion in the business; and it required but little attention to discover that the plan proposed by the Senate was better than what gentlemen proposed to substitute, inasmuch as it was more complete, and not more expensive. There would be a uniformity of decision under the former; while the latter would render the construction of the law vague, if not various. It would less disturb the harmony of the States; and of consequence be more agreeable to the people. He hoped the committee would reject the motion for striking out the clause.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, observed that all the difficulties and inconveniences which the gentlemen have started as arising from the establishment of a District court arise from the Government itself. All the objections made to this court apply equally against having any National Judiciary. Indeed, if they had any weight, they would as forcibly apply to the very institution which the gentlemen patronize, viz: a court of admiralty and piracy. If there is to be this perpetual clashing of jurisdictions between the Federal and State courts, this eternal jarring between their respective officers, will not these embarrassments exist under any judicial system that the ingenuity of man can devise? Will they not take place under the establishment proposed by the other side? And will the mere alteration of the court from a district, to a court of admiralty and piracy, remedy this evil? But these objections come too late, a National Government is established. The Judicial power is a component part of this Government, and must be commensurate to it. If we have a Government pervading the Union, we must have a judicial power of similar magnitude; we must establish courts in different parts of the Union. The only question is, which is the plan best calculated to answer the great object we all have in view, the carrying the Judicial powers into operation with the least inconvenience to the citizens. This double system of jurisprudence is unavoidable; it is as much a part of the Constitution as the double system of legislation; each State has a Legislative power, both operating on the same persons, and in many cases on the same objects; it is infinitely more difficult to mark with precision the limits of the Legislature than the Judicial power; no one, however, disputed the propriety of vesting Congress with a Legislative power over the Union, and yet that power is perhaps more liable to abuse than the Judicial. It has, indeed, been contended, in some of the State conventions, that Congress ought not to be entrusted with direct taxation; and it is remarkable that the same obstacles were urged against that power which is now suggested against this institution. It was then said that Federal and State taxes could not operate at the same time without confusion; it was then facetiously asked, whether the Congressional and State collector, who had seized a horse for the payment of taxes, were to divide him between them; it is now asked, with equal pleasantry, whether the marshal of the district, and the sheriff of the State court, who have taken the same debtor in execution, are to cut him in halves? It was then answered, that if the State collector seized the horse first, he will have the first satisfaction; it was also shown that there are frequently in the same State, State taxes, county taxes, and corporation taxes, and that these never occasioned any clashing or confusion; it may now be answered, that there are at present in some of the States, State courts, county courts, and corporation courts; and that these are found convenient, and unaccompanied with the clashing so much apprehended. They keep within their particular spheres, and have their limits ascertained. But in answer to one supposition, allow me to state another; suppose a State sheriff and a county sheriff should seize the same debtor, would he be parcelled out between them? Would not the execution that was first served take effect? Is not this the practice at present, and will it not be so under this system? It is very easy for gentlemen, in the warmth of their imaginations, to suppose a variety of cases, and raise a multiplicity of objections against any system of jurisprudence whatever. They will all be more or less liable to some objections on the score of inconvenience, but they are submitted to by good citizens, who are sensible that they are the surest means of protecting their property, reputations, and lives. After all that has been said, it does not appear that we differ so widely as was at first imagined; for the gentlemen who advocate the motion, concede the necessity of some inferior Federal court in each State. What then do gentlemen object to? If it is the name of the court, that may be altered; if it is the frequency of holding them, it will be very easy to amend the clause in that respect; but they move to strike out the clause altogether, when it is granted on all hands that there must be such a court. The objection to the extent of jurisdiction is premature, and ought to be reserved for the clause which ascertains the jurisdiction; if, upon an investigation of that clause, it should appear that it ought to be restricted, that would be the seasonable time for moving to strike out the objectionable part; but really at present gentlemen are making objections to one clause which, from their own concessions, apply altogether to another. As to several other observations that relate to the time of holding the courts, and the mode of drawing jurors, it is unnecessary to reply to them at present, because it would be improper to run into a discussion of the detail, while the question is on the principle of the system. He was no less opposed to the time of holding the courts, and the mode of drawing jurors, provided by the bill, than the gentleman was from whom the objection came, and would add his endeavors with his to effect an alteration in these points; but this is not the proper time, we are now on the principle, whether there shall be a District court: the same answer will apply to the objection that the juries and witnesses will be unnecessarily harassed; every care will be taken to accommodate these courts to the convenience of the citizens of each State.

Several other difficulties have been urged, as growing out of this plan of jurisdiction; a candid discussion will remove and obviate them. It has been said that the bill provides a number of appeals from the State to the Supreme Court, through the District and Circuit courts, and that the suitors may be persecuted with appeals, carried on from one court to another, through four different courts. An attentive examination of the bill is a sufficient answer to this objection. There is no appeal from the State to the District courts; and only a power of removal in certain cases of a Federal jurisdiction from the State to the Circuit court; neither is there any appeal of fact from the District to the Circuit courts, and only a power of removal in certain cases of a Federal jurisdiction from the State to the Circuit court; neither is there any appeal of fact from the District to the Circuit courts, but in admiralty cases; and these cannot be afterwards carried up to the Supreme Court, but when the value exceeds two thousand dollars.

It has been said, that, under the idea of vicinage, a man may be dragged far from his friends to trial, from Georgia to North Carolina; but it must be remembered that there is a Constitutional provision that the criminal shall be tried in the State where the offence is committed, and the bill is conformable to the Constitution in this respect. It has been observed that the Constitution is no bar to vesting the State courts with Federal powers, for the words, "such inferior courts as Congress shall, from time to time, establish," imply that Congress may not institute them; and if they are not instituted, these powers must of course remain with the State courts. In reply to this argument, it is to be observed, that the words, "such inferior courts," &c., apply to the number and quality of the inferior Federal courts, and not to the possibility of excluding them altogether; it is a latitude of expression empowering Congress to institute such a number of inferior courts, of such particular construction, and at such particular places, as shall be found expedient; in short, in the words of the Constitution, Congress may establish such inferior courts as may appear requisite. But that Congress must establish some inferior courts is beyond a doubt; in the first place, the Constitution declares that the Judicial power of the United States shall be vested in a Supreme and in inferior courts. The words, "shall be vested," have great energy; they are words of command; they leave no discretion to Congress to parcel out the Judicial powers of the Union to State jurisdictions, where a discretionary power is left to Congress by the Constitution; the word "may" is employed where a discretion is left; the word "shall" is the appropriate term; this distinction is cautiously observed. Again, the Supreme Court, in two cases only, has original jurisdiction; in all others it has appellate jurisdiction; but where is the appeal to come from? Certainly not from the State courts; it must come from a Federal tribunal. There is another argument that appears conclusive; the Constitution provides that the Judges of the Supreme and inferior courts shall hold their commissions during good behaviour, and shall receive salaries not capable of diminution; and it further provides, that the Judicial power of the Union shall be vested in a Supreme and inferior courts; that is, in supreme and inferior courts whose Judges shall receive their commissions during good behaviour, and possess salaries not liable to diminution.

Does not, then, the Constitution, in the plainest and most unequivocal language, preclude us from allotting any part of the Judicial authority of the Union to the State judiciary? The bill, it is said, is then unconstitutional, for it recognises the authority of the Federal court to overturn the decisions of the State courts, when those decisions are repugnant to the laws or Constitution of the United States. This is no recognition of any such authority; it is a necessary provision to guard the rights of the Union against the invasion of the States. If a State court should usurp the jurisdiction of Federal causes, and by its adjudications attempt to strip the Federal Government of its Constitutional rights, it is necessary that the National tribunal shall possess the power of protecting those rights from such invasion. The committee have been told that this multiplicity of courts, and of appeals, will distress the citizens; and the number of appeals in Great Britain has been alluded to. He had always heard, he said, that there was no country in the world where justice was better administered than in that country; to its excellent and impartial administration, the property, freedom, and civil rights of its citizens have been attributed. Were appeals too much restrained in this country, he questioned much whether a great clamor would not be raised against such a restriction. The citizens of a free country, when they lose their cause in one court, like to try their chance in another. This is a privilege they consider themselves justly entitled to; and if a litigious man harass his adversary by vexatious appeals, he is sufficiently punished by having the costs to pay. By limiting appeals to the Supreme Court to sums above one thousand dollars, as is proposed, the poor will be protected from being harassed by appeals to the Supreme Court.

There was one more observation that required an answer; it was said that the juries shall be so drawn as to occasion the smallest inconvenience to the citizens. After having very maturely considered the subject, and attentively examined the bill in all its modifications, and heard all that had been alleged on this occasion, he was perfectly convinced, that whatever defects might be discovered in other parts of the bill, the adoption of this motion would tend to the rejection of every system of national jurisprudence.

Mr. MADISON said, that he was inclined to amend every part of the bill, so as to remove gentlemen's jealousy, provided it could be done consistently with the Constitution.

Mr. GERRY was sorry to hear the honorable gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. BURKE) renounce his intention of opposing the system any further; he thought gentlemen ought not to be tired out like a jury.

Mr. BURKE said, he was not tired with the discussion, but was satisfied that the opposition must be unsuccessful.

The committee now rose and reported progress.—Adjourned.

MONDAY, August 31.

The engrossed bill to suspend part of an act to regulate the collection of the duties imposed by law on the tonnage of ships or vessels, on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States, was read a third time, and, on motion, ordered to be committed to Messrs. GOODHUE, CARROLL, LEE, and BLAND, with instruction to the said committee to insert a clause or clauses for establishing Bath and Frenchman's Bay, in the State of Massachusetts, ports of delivery for all foreign vessels.

THE JUDICIARY.

The House then went again into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for establishing the Judicial Courts of the United States; Mr. BOUNDINOR in the Chair.

The question being still on striking out the third clause—

Mr. LIVERMORE thought this law would entirely change the form of Government of the United States.

Several observations have been made on this clause; it is said to be the axis on which the whole turns; some of the objections he had thrown out have been attempted to be answered; among others, the great expense. By expense he did not mean the salaries of Judges; this would, however, be greater than the whole expense of the Judiciary throughout the United States; but he referred to the general expenses which must be borne by the people at large for jails, court-houses, &c.; borne without repining, as the people receive compensation in personal security and public justice; but if all these were doubled throughout, it would be justly considered as intolerable. Another burden, he said, was the rapidity of the course of prosecution in these courts, by which debtors would be obliged very suddenly to pay their debts at a great disadvantage. Something like this occasioned the insurrection in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. In other States, similar modes of rapidity in the collection of debts have produced conventions. This had been the case to the northward, and he had been informed, had been the same to the southward.

This new fangled system would eventually swallow up the State courts, as those who were in favor of this rapid mode of receiving debts, would have recourse to them. He then adverted to the clashing circumstances that must arise in the administration of justice, by these independent courts having similar powers. Gentlemen, said he, may be very facetious respecting dividing the body; but these are serious difficulties; the instances mentioned by the gentleman from South Carolina do not apply, the officer here is the same the same sheriff has the precepts committed to him; and the execution does not clash; the same jail answers for both.

He did not think that the difficulties had been answered by any of the examples brought for the purpose.

As to the instance of the trial for piracy in the State of South Carolina, that was a particular case, that could not be otherwise provided for; but these so rarely happen, that no precedent could be drawn from them to render it necessary to establish these perpetual courts.

He then referred to the clause, and offered a substitute, and said he thought, upon the whole, that the suggestion thrown out by an honorable gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Bunker) that there should be no district courts, is better than any substitute.

It may be proper here to refer to the Constitution; he then read the clause upon the subject. The Federal court is to have original jurisdiction only in certain specified cases; in all other it is to have only appellate jurisdiction; it is argued from this, that there are to be inferior Federal courts, from which these appeals are to be made. If the Constitution had taken from State courts all cognizance of Federal causes, something might be said; but this is not the case. The State courts are allowed jurisdiction in these cases.

It has been objected that bonds taken by the Judges of the Supreme Court cannot be sued in the State courts. He did not see why this could not be done; similar processes have been usual among us in times past, and there has been no difficulty.

Admiralty courts should have cognizance of all maritime matters, and cases of seizures should also be committed to their decision. He hoped, therefore, that the clause would be disagreed to, or struck out, and that the bill might be rejected, that a short concise system might be adopted.

Mr. Vining said he conceived that the institution of general and independent tribunals were essential to the fair and impartial administration of the laws of the United States. That the power of making laws, of executing them, and a judicial administration of such laws, is in its nature inseparable and indivisible, if not, "justice might be said to be lame as well as blind among us."

The only plausible argument which has been urged against this clause is the expense. It is true that expense must in some degree be necessarily incurred, but it will chiefly consist with the organization of your courts, and the erection of such buildings as may be essential, such as court-houses, jails, and offices, as the gentleman has mentioned; and what, at all events, do such expenses amount to? They are the price that is paid for the fair and equal administration of your laws; from your amazing increasing system of government, causes must necessarily multiply in a proportionably extensive ratio; these causes must be tried somewhere, and whether it is in a State court, or Federal judicature, and in the article of expense, make but little difference to the parties; it is only (for the sake of more impartial justice) transferring the business from one tribunal to another.

The gentleman has told us that the people do not like courts; that they have been opposed and prevented by violence; nay, by an insurrection in Massachusetts. Surely this operates as a powerful reason to prove that there should be a general, independent, and energetic jurisdiction; otherwise, if either of the State Judges should be so inclined, or a few sons of faction so assembled, they could ever frustrate the objects of justice; and, besides, from the different periods fixed by the Constitution of the United States, and the different constitutions of the several States, with respect to the continuance of the Judges in office, it is equally impossible and inconsistent to make a general, uniform establishment, so as to accommodate them to your government.

He wished, he said, to see justice so equally distributed, as that every citizen of the United States should be fairly dealt by, and so impartially administered, that every subject or citizen of the world, whether foreigner or alien, friend or foe, should be alike satisfied; by this means, the doors of justice would be thrown wide open, emigration would be encouraged from all countries into your own, and, in short, the United States of America would be made not only an asylum of liberty, but a sanctuary of justice. The faith of treaties would be preserved inviolate; our extensive funded system would have its intended operation; our navigation, impost, and revenue laws would be executed so as to insure their many advantages, whilst the combined effect would establish the public and private credit of the Union.

Mr. Stowe.—I am mistaken if the whole subject has yet come before us in its full extent, and I think it ought to be thoroughly investigated before it is decided upon.

I declare myself, Mr. Chairman, much pleased with the discussion, and am gratified with the different points of view in which it has been placed; but I conceive there is a variety of considerations arising out of the subject which have not yet been touched upon. I have seriously reflected, sir, on the subject, and have endeavored to give the arguments all the weight they deserve. I think, before we enter into a view of the convenience of the system, it will be right to consider the Constitutional ground on which we stand.

Gentlemen, in their arguments, have expressly or impliedly declared that the Constitution, in this respect, is imperative—that it commands the organization of inferior courts. If this doctrine is true, let us see where it will carry us. It is conceded on all hands that the establishment of these courts is immutable. If the command of the Constitution is imperative, we must carry it through all its branches; but if it is not true, we may model it so as to suit the convenience of the present time. It appears from the words of the Constitution, that Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish inferior courts, such as they think proper. Now, if this is a command for us to establish inferior courts, if we cannot model or restrain their jurisdictions, the words which give us the power from time to time to do, are vain and nugatory. Do the words "from time to time" leave any thing to our discretion? Or must we establish in our own minds a given length of time to gratify its meaning? Are we to compare it with the case of a census, and confine it to a subsequent term of ten years? If you establish inferior courts upon this principle, you have expended your whole power upon the subject for that length of time, and cannot interfere until the term arrives which you have fixed in your own mind for the power to return. But the words "ordain and establish" will not only go to the appointment of Judges of inferior courts, but they comprehend every thing which relates to them; we have good authority for this opinion, because one branch of the Legislature has expressly laid it down in the bill before us; they have modified the tribunal; they have restrained its jurisdiction; they have directed appeals only to be had in certain cases; they have connected the State courts with the district courts in some cases; this shows that, in their opinion, the articles of the Constitution gave them a latitude. It is not said in that instrument that you shall exercise the judicial power over all those cases, but that the judicial power shall extend to those cases. If it had been the idea of the convention that its Judiciary should extend so as positively to have taken in all these cases, they would have so declared it, and been explicit; but they have given you a power to extend your jurisdiction to them, but have not compelled you to that extension. Several gentlemen have mistaken this idea, and that on very different ground. The gentleman from Virginia has compared the exercise of the Judiciary to that of the Executive and Legislative powers, and seems from his arguments to infer that if you do not extend the Judiciary power, so as to take in all those cases which are specified in the Constitution, that you will leave the Judiciary defective.

The gentleman from New York seems to think it will be an abandonment of our Judicial power altogether. To what does the Legislative power of this Government extend? To a variety of cases which are not yet put in action; for instance, the Legislative power extends to excises and direct taxes. If you conceive the Judiciary incomplete, because you have not strained it to its utmost extension, cannot you see, from the same principle, that the Legislative power is not complete unless you extend it as far as you have the power? Do you divest yourself of the power by not exercising it? Certainly not. Suppose you were to lay as heavy a land tax as the people could bear, (and this is in our power by the terms of the Constitution,) and suppose the people were to ask you why you had done so, when there was no absolute necessity for it, would you answer that the Constitution has given us the power, therefore we must exercise it? Certainly not. The Constitution has given us power to admit that a suit in certain cases shall be brought for six-pence; this we may authorize to be done in an inferior court—from the District Court it is carried to the Circuit Court, and may be brought up to the Supreme Court. This power, I say, we have by the Constitution; would it be proper to exercise it? But these circumstances would certainly follow from a construction that the Constitution was imperative, and that you must establish inferior tribunals on the terms of the Constitution.

I understood it to be said by the gentleman from New York, and decided, that the establishment of inferior courts would draw the whole Judiciary power along with them. If the clause in the Constitution commands that inferior courts be established, what are their powers? They will claim all the jurisdiction to which it is declared the Judicial power shall extend—it is the right the Constitution has given them after you have established the courts; any modification, therefore, or restriction of their power, would be a nullity; hence it appears to me, if the gentleman's principle is right, that part of your bill which restricts their cognizance to a particular sum is a nullity.

I apprehend that the gentlemen who support this bill have differed widely from the body that passed it, in supposing two things; first, that whatever Continental jurisdiction is exercised that it follows they are Continental courts, and must have Continental salaries, and hold their offices during good behaviour; if this is the case, the Senate have done one of two things, they have either relinquished all the penalties due to Government for a non-compliance of the laws under one hundred dollars, by the 9th section of the bill; or they have established the doctrine which gentlemen on this side contend for. By this section they have given to the State courts jurisdiction in cases of an inferior magnitude; now the very moment any suit is brought by the United States, under one hundred dollars, before a State court, such court becomes a Continental court. I say they must run into this absurdity, or relinquish all suits under one hundred dollars. But if this is not the case; if they do not relinquish this sum, (and the Senate did not suppose this was ever to be given up,) they did what appears, upon the gentleman's principles, very strange indeed: they leave Continental courts to be established by their bringing suits, or foreigners bringing suits into the State courts; and in this way they divest the President of his power of appointing judges of inferior courts. This appears to my mind a strange mode of reasoning.

A gentleman has said that it would be impracticable to admit the judges of the several States to take cognizance of the laws of the United States, because they are laws de novo: this I think is the idea. I apprehend that judges, when they have undertaken their duty, must be considered in two respects—as citizens and as judges. Now as men, they are to submit to the modification of the Constitution as it respects them as citizens; and as judges, they are to consider their relation as such to the Constitution, and are to administer justice agreeably to that Constitution; as judges they may divest themselves of this relation; they may resign, but if they continue to act as judges, they are enjoined to obey the Constitution of the United States, and laws established under it: now judges know that it is in the power of the United States to change the State Constitutions, and they must conform in every respect. A judge binds himself not only to act upon the laws which have already passed, but to obey all that may hereafter pass. If it is admitted that the judges cannot take cognizance of the laws de novo, you annihilate the judicial capacity at a blow; they cannot notice the adoption of the Federal Constitution or any law passed after appointment. I can hardly bring myself seriously to consider the subject in this reverse point of view. Gentlemen will be convinced, I hope, that I take all the pains I possibly can to understand and discuss the arguments made use of; they will admit that if my principles are right, Congress may establish the courts on what terms they may think proper.

Judiciary.

It will perhaps be well to consider what the State courts can do, and consider what they are not competent to, and the reason we should not trust them. It appears to me that there is nothing but what the State courts are competent to but certain cases which are specially designated; in cases where a State is a party they ought not to decide, because they could not execute their judgment; they would be competent to all admiralty cases, but for the fact I mentioned before, that admiralty courts are not established in all the States. I take it to be true that all the judicial powers not taken away by the Constitution from the States, remain to them, and I take them to be complete Republics, to have sovereign power, conformable to their nature; therefore, if the Constitution of the United States had not interfered in the subject, even of treason against the Union, the States, I apprehend, except in a few instances, could not have taken notice of it, because I do not know any kind of treason against the United States. But is also treason against a particular State. If a man raises an army in the body of a State, unauthorized by the State, is it not rebellion against the State? Suppose it to be done in this State, and they tell you it is not the State of New York they mean to oppose, it is the General Government, pray is not this treason against the State of New York as a member of the Union? Is not a piracy committed against the United States committed against a particular State? If it had its sovereign authority unimpaired, would any gentlemen contend that they had not power to try for piracy? I apprehend they would not. If a bond is given to the United States, or a penalty accrues under the supreme law of the land, or if a debt is due to a foreigner, may it not be sued in any part of the Union? I believe there is little doubt but this might be properly done—the Senate, by this bill, have given us this construction: foreigners may sue and be sued in all the States. This has already been done; do gentlemen now contend, that these suits shall be exclusively in the Continental courts? If they do, it would be an infringement of the private contracts, it would be an ex post facto law. The citizen might suppose, when he contracted his debt, that he might bring his suit in a State court; if you exclude him from this privilege, you destroy the right he had; a right, notwithstanding all that may be affirmed of the wisdom, honesty, and expedition of the courts of the United States, yet to him it may appear ten to one better to be secured in his rights in State courts. I think the inconvenience which will attend these courts has been fully explained; but certainly it has not been fully considered how far the inconveniences heretofore sustained may be compared to the inconveniences which may hereafter happen; perhaps there are no instances in point. Gentlemen are mistaken, who suppose that because there are many tribunals in the State they are necessarily exposed to the same difficulties as will arise from the establishment of Federal and State courts. I will state a case: A man is taken in Maryland by a writ from the county court, to which he gives bail. If he is taken by writ from the general court, he must also give bail, or go to prison. But if he is unable on the first writ to give bail and goes to prison, then the sheriff returns to the General Court that he has taken him, and he is in jail. This is a good return, as well in civil as in criminal process; as well upon mesne process as in execution; and if either of the courts required his appearance in court, an habeas corpus may be granted; by which he will be brought into court, and remanded, if proper. Here is no danger of defeating rights, nor acquiring inconvenience, because the same jail will be made use of, and the same sheriff will hold, and always be liable for his prisoner. As the courts are connected, they will ex officio take notice of, and admit the proceedings of, each other.

But in different tribunals, not connected, mischiefs may happen. Will a sheriff be justifiable in delivering up his prisoner to the marshal, or will it be a proper return by the marshal that the prisoner is kept by the State sheriff. If the first position is true, you ought to show that the marshal is liable to the State creditor for an escape, and you ought also to show that the marshal will return his prisoner to the State jail. If the second, you ought to show that the sheriff is justifiable in detaining a man after the cause for which he was committed to his custody ceased. An execution against the property depends upon the same principles; because the priority avoids all difficulty. If all the property is taken by the prior execution, the return of that fact is a proper return. But property is bound by the time of judgment in some cases, and the time of execution is put into the sheriff's hands in others. Now there is no difference where the same sheriff receives all. But suppose there is a different time of rendering judgment, and of receiving execution, and both are levied at the same time either upon body or goods. The rules of the courts are different; there will be different determinations in each, and perhaps each justifying their own affirmation. Even they may clash as to a matter of right. Suppose goods are stolen, and a prosecution is set on foot in the Federal court as of goods belonging to the United States, and at the same time an indictment is laid in the State court, for stealing goods, as for the goods of A: there is a conviction in each; the goods are to be returned to the owner. Now the courts in their several capacities justify their officers; and they proceed severally to seize goods or body; and failing in strength, the posse comitatus is raised on both sides; murder may be the consequence; and if it should, each court justifying the act of its officers, and condemning the others, all the officers in the different courts must be hanged for acting legally.

Judiciary.

These are the inconveniences which result from a system of this kind, and why are these inconveniences to be encountered? Is it because such a system will be popular? I cannot conceive it warrantable upon this ground; it seems to me to be laid upon a principle directly opposite to that of being agreeable to the people. Will it be agreeable to the Judges? That cannot be, because it is intended to correct the vices of the State Judiciary. Will it be considered as necessary by the State Legislature? Gentlemen have agreed that it will not be agreeable to the State Legislatures, and we find in general, the sentiments of the people expressed by the Legislatures; from these circumstances, I conceive that this system cannot, in its nature, be agreeable to the State Government, or to the people. I do not think this, then, the proper time to establish these courts; it is a measure on which the affection and attachment of the people to the Constitution will be risked; it is best to defer the business till the necessity of these courts shall become apparent. I could therefore wish, that the power should be reserved for the occasion, and that nothing should be done the present session but what is absolutely necessary, less by extending these matters too far, we should give the people a disposition to curtail our authority; they might then not confine themselves to an alteration in the judicial department alone, they might extend it so far as to injure the Executive and Legislative, if not to the total change or destruction of the whole system of Government. I am, sir, for this Government moving as silently as death, that the people should not perceive the least alteration for the worse in their situation; the exercise of this power will certainly be the most odious that can be exercised, for mankind do not generally view courts of justice with a favorable eye, they are intended to correct the voices of the community, and consequently are disagreeable to human nature. It was well observed, and I concur in the opinion, that of all the wheels in Government, the Judicial is the most disagreeable.

Mr. Gerry.—The gentlemen who support the motion for striking out the clause, urge that this system will interfere with the State Judiciary, that it will occasion a double set of officers, separate prisons and court-houses, and in general that the expenses will increase to a degree heretofore unknown, and consequently render the establishment obnoxious to the community. These objections are of such weight, as to have made deep impression on my mind. But what do gentlemen propose? Do they believe that these disadvantages can be remedied by Congress? I think they cannot; they result from the Constitution itself, and therefore must be borne until the Constitution is altered, or until the several States shall modify their courts of judicature so as to comport with our system.

Gentlemen have said, that the Federal Judiciary will be disagreeable to the citizens of the United States. These it should be recollected were divided into two classes; the one was for an unconditional ratification of the present Constitution; the other was against such a measure. There appeared to be a majority of the first description, and we must suppose they understood what would be the operation of the system of Government they adopted with such avidity; if they did not, they entrusted the decisions to conventions of men whom they suppose did. We must admit that they knew their business, and saw it would be for the benefit of their constituents, or we must suppose they were weak or wicked men to adopt a Constitution without understanding it; this last supposition being inadmissible, I take it, then, their observations only refer to that part of our fellow-citizens who were against the unconditional ratification. Now I believe with them, that this part of the community, at least, will be uneasy under the operation of such a Judicial system. But how can it be remedied? The motion of the honorable gentleman from New Hampshire extends to prevent the establishment of inferior tribunals, except for the trial of admiralty causes; what, then, is to be done with all the other cases of which the Supreme Court has only appellate jurisdiction? You cannot make Federal courts of the State courts, because the Constitution is an insuperable bar; besides, the laws and constitutions of some States expressly prohibit the State Judges from administering or taking cognizance of foreign matters. New Hampshire requires all her civil officers to be appointed by the Legislature, and for what length of time they shall determine; now this is contrary to the indispensable tenure required by the Constitution of the United States. All judicial officers in Massachusetts must be appointed by the Governor, with the advice of council, and may be removed by the same power, upon the address of both Houses of the Legislature. There is another provision in the same Constitution, incompatible with the terms of the Judicial capacity under Congress. "All writs issuing out of the clerk's office, in any of the courts of law, shall be in the name of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts," &c. The Constitution of Maryland establishes their Judges on the tenure of good behavior; but they may be removed for misbehavior, on conviction in a court of law. The Judges of the Federal court are to be removed only by impeachment and conviction before Congress. I suppose the same, or similar difficulties exist in every State, and therefore the State courts would be improper tribunals to administer the laws of the United States, while the present Constitution remains, or while they are not established.

lished by the individual States, upon the terms required in this Constitution.

We are to administer this Constitution, and therefore we are bound to establish these courts, let what will be the consequence. Gentlemen say they are willing to establish Courts of Admiralty; but what is to become of the other cases to which the Continental jurisdiction is extended by the Constitution? When we have established the courts as they propose, have fixed the salaries, and the Supreme Executive has appointed the Judges, they will be independent, and no power can remove them; they will be beyond the reach of the Executive or Legislative powers of this Government; they will be unassailable by the State Legislatures; nothing can affect them but the united voice of America, and that only by a change of Government. They will, in this elevated and independent situation, attend to their duty—their honor and every sacred tie obliges them. Will they not attend to the Constitution as well as your laws? The Constitution will undoubtedly be their first rule; and so far as your laws conform to that, they will attend to them, but no further. Would they then be confined by your laws within a less jurisdiction than they were authorized to take by the Constitution? You must admit them to be inferior courts; and the Constitution positively says, that the Judicial powers of the United States shall be so vested. They would then inquire what were the Judicial powers of the Union, and undertake the exercise thereof, notwithstanding any Legislative declaration to the contrary; consequently their system would be a nullity, at least, which attempted to restrict the jurisdiction of inferior courts.

It has been said, that much inconvenience will result from the clashing of jurisdiction. Perhaps this is but ideal; if, however, it should be found to be the case, the General Government must remove the obstacles. They are authorized to suppress any system injurious to the administration of this Constitution, by the clause granting to Congress the power of making all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers of the Constitution, or any department thereof. It is without a desire to increase the difficulties of the proposed arrangements, that I make these observations, for I am desirous of profiting the unity of the two Governments, and this, I apprehend, can be done only by drawing a line between the two Judicial powers.

Mr. JACKSON.—I would not rise again, but from the great anxiety I feel to have this business well understood and determined. I am not for doing away the whole of the Judiciary power, but so ameliorating it as to make it agreeable and consistent. My heart, sir, is federal; and I would do as much as any member on this floor, on any, and on every occasion, to promote the interests and welfare of the Union. But in the present important question, I conceive the liberties of my fellow-citizens too deeply involved to suffer me to risk such a precious state, though to secure the efficiency of a National Government.

It has been said in this debate, that the State

Judges would be partial, and that there were no means of dragging them to justice. Shall I peremptorily tell the gentlemen who hold this opinion, that there is a Constitutional power in existence to call them to account. Need I add that the Supreme Federal Court will have the right to annul these partial adjudications? Thus, then, all these arguments fall to the ground, on the slightest recollection.

Will gentlemen contend that it is for the convenience and security of the people that these inferior courts should be established? I believe this sentiment may be successfully controverted. The accurate Marquis Beccaria points out a danger which it behooves us to guard against. In every society, says he, there is an effort continually tending to confer on one part the height of power and happiness, and to reduce the other to the extreme of weakness and misery. The intent of good laws is to oppose this effort, and diffuse their influence universally and equally. But men generally abandon the care of their most important concerns, to the uncertain prudence and discretion of those whose interest it is to reject the best and wisest institutions; and it is not till they have been led into a thousand mistakes in matters the most essential to their lives and liberties, and are weary of suffering, that they can be induced to apply a remedy to the evils with which they are oppressed. It is then they begin to conceive and acknowledge the most palpable truths which, from their simplicity, commonly escape vulgar minds, incapable of analyzing objects, accustomed to receive impressions without distinction, and to be determined rather by the opinions of others than by the result of their own examination.

This celebrated writer pursues the principle still further, and confirms what we urge on our side against the unnecessary establishment of inferior courts. He asserts, with the great Montesquieu, that every punishment which does not arise from absolute necessity is tyrannical; a proposition which may be made more general thus, every act of authority of one man over another for which there is not an absolute necessity is tyrannical. It is upon this, then, that the Sovereign's right to punish crimes is founded; that is, upon the necessity of defending the public liberty entrusted to his care, from the usurpation of individuals; and punishments are just, in proportion as the liberty preserved by the Sovereign is sacred and valuable.

He now wished the House to consider whether there was a necessity for the present establishment; and if it should appear, as he thought had been plainly shown, that no such necessity existed, it would be a tyranny which the people of this country would never be content to bear.

He had attended to the arguments of gentlemen who insisted upon the necessity of such establishments; but his mind was far from being satisfied that the necessity existed. In the Constitution it is declared that the Judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish. From hence he presumed that there was a Constitutional necessity for the establishment of a Supreme Court, but there was a discretionary power in Congress to establish, from time to time, inferior courts; but until they are appointed, it cannot be contended that the State courts are deprived of taking cognizance of certain cases enumerated in the Constitution. If Congress do not think there is a Constitutional necessity, they ought not to appoint them, because they are burdensome and disagreeable to the people.

He presumed that there was no greater Constitutional necessity under the present Constitution than there was under the late articles of Confederation. It is there declared, that Congress may, from time to time, institute inferior courts, for the trials of pirates and felonies committed on the high seas, and establish courts for receiving and determining finally in all cases of captures; yet these powers were carried into execution under the State Judiciaries. There is not a State but has exercised the Admiralty jurisdiction in its fullest extent: they have not determined inferior cases only, they have not been confined even to the condemnation of goods and vessels, but they have condemned and executed persons for piracy. If, then, they could do this, notwithstanding a solemn contract in the Confederation, why cannot it be done in the present case? We trust the State Judiciaries with jurisdiction in some cases, why cannot we trust them in all? Will gentlemen pretend to say that the check furnished by the Supreme Courts, to revise and correct their judgments on appeal, is not sufficient to secure the due administration of justice? They cannot pretend to make such an assertion on mature deliberation.

Mr. LIVERMORE.—It has been said that this Government cannot be carried into execution, unless we establish inferior courts, because the State Judges would not be bound to carry our laws into execution. I will just read a few words in the Constitution, in order to determine this point: in the sixth article it is said, that all Executive and Judicial officers, both of the United States, and the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation, to support this Constitution; and in the same article it is also declared, that this Constitution and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitution or the laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding. He looked upon this to be a clear answer to all the objections drawn from that source. He would ask the gentleman whether the State courts were not adequate to decide all these questions from the time the Constitution was ratified till this day. He presumed they were, and might continue to exercise jurisdiction until Congress thought proper to establish such inferior courts as they were authorized to do, but which he did not think at this time to be necessary.

Mr. LAWRENCE was willing to give the Constitution all the effect it ought to have; but he would not be willing to carry into operation any part of it unnecessarily, especially if the inconveniences and dangers so often repeated must be the consequence. He had endeavored to investigate the subject, and satisfy his own mind, with respect to the propriety of the present measure; he found, by the Constitution, that there were several powers given to the Government, but vested in different branches. He presumed that they were for beneficial purposes, and ought to be exercised when an occasion presented. The Executive power had been exercised already as occasion required, the Legislative power had been extended in the same manner. We are now about to extend the powers of the Judiciary; and it has been asked, shall we employ this power in all the cases to which it extends, or shall we employ it to certain enumerated cases alone? He was of opinion that it ought to be employed so as to embrace all the cases which necessity requires; it is admitted, on all hands, that necessity requires we should establish superior, and some kind of inferior courts. The only question that then remained, was to know how far this extended; it was not, therefore, a question on principle, but a question of expediency; and in this view he considered the bill to be proper.

Mr. GERRY thought the gentleman from New Hampshire extended the sixth article of the Constitution too far; for the State Judges would not be bound by any law altering the State constitution, unless such law was necessary to carry into operation the Constitution of the Union.

Mr. SUMNER could not reconcile it to himself to sit and give a silent vote on this important question; at the same time he was loth to take up the time of the committee when they were impatient to come to a decision. He did not rise, however, to object to the Legislature possessing the power of adopting the present system, because he thought the new Constitution warranted the exercise of it; but he questioned whether it was expedient at the present moment. He knew too sensibly the situation of his constituents, to suppose that such an expensive and distrustful system could be agreeable to them. It would be cruel in their present distressed situation, to encumber them with a branch of Government, which could be as well, and perhaps better, done without. It was hostile to their liberties, and dangerous in the extreme; he could not think so ill of his fellow-citizens as to suppose that the rein of despotism was necessary to curb them. Under these impressions, he could not help expressing his dissatisfaction with the present bill; it was a system of oppression which the people neither desired, nor were prepared to receive. Gentlemen ought to recollect that the Constitution was adopted by a small majority of the people of the United States, if any majority at all; however, this point he would not now contest; but he would be bold to say, that it was adopted under a firm confidence that it would exercise no tyrannical power. At this early period, then, it would be dangerous to the existence of Government to assume authority for which there was not an absolute necessity.

Judiciary.

[SEPTEMBER, 1789.]

Gentlemen urged, that this was not an expensive Government; but to the eye of the people, who have not been accustomed to such a numerous set of officers, it would not appear in the same light. Will it be thought that the establishment of numerous courts are without expense, or that they will exercise their jurisdiction without oppression? Or do gentlemen believe that the circumstances of the people are able to bear the expenses of a double band of officers? If such is their opinion, they are certainly mistaken, at least so far as it respects the State of South Carolina. Will gentlemen contend that this judicial establishment will not bring about the destruction of the State Judiciaries? And are they prepared to prove, to the satisfaction of my constituents, that such a measure would tend to preserve the liberties of America? Is the licentiousness which has been complained of in our State courts, so great as to warrant an exertion of power, little, if any thing, short of tyranny? I cannot believe it is. The people of America do not require the iron hand of power to keep them within due bounds; they are sufficiently enlightened to know and pursue their own good. How, then, will they receive a system founded upon distrust and levelled against the free exercise of that liberty which they have secured to our common country? Can not a more moderate and convenient mode be found out? Most certainly it can. Let us then reject the present system, and endeavor to introduce one more adapted to their convenience and expectations. I have no doubt but the abilities in this House would produce one infinitely more acceptable than that on the table, and which would secure the happiness and harmony of this country.

Mr. BURKE.—Although I foresee I shall have the honor to vote in the minority, yet I wish to say a few words, that the reasons of my opposition to the bill may be fully understood. The motion made by the worthy member from New Hampshire, (Mr. LIVERMORE,) I wish to support, provided he intends by it to throw out the whole bill. For I am persuaded, if it passes, that consequences of a serious nature to the privileges of the people will flow from it. It will materially affect the trial by jury, and overturn that system of administering justice which time and long experience have recommended to our citizens. To show this, I shall only advert to the twenty-ninth section; out of this, sir, will arise constructions and consequences, of which people in general will form no conception; it requires some share of law-knowledge to comprehend it. Whoever drew that clause did it artfully, and with a view of concealing the features of it; and I give him full credit for the share his head had in it. Read the words, and you see held out to the citizen a fair and impartial trial by a jury of the vicinage, while it insidiously strips him of this happy privilege. For if a man be charged with treason, or other offence against the Government, committed as far back as Lake Ontario, instead of being brought to trial in the county, or district, where he is said to have committed the offence, as the State law directs at present, he is to be dragged down to the city of New York, to take his trial there; not by a jury taken from the country at large, as at present, but this section is so subtly framed, that a jury may be picked, not merely within the city, but within any particular ward of it.

The State to which I belong is divided into seven districts or counties; and a person accused of committing a capital offence in one county, as the law is at present, must be tried in that county, and no other; the jury must also be of the same county, and to be drawn by ballot, in order to secure a fair and impartial trial to the prisoner. But of this glorious and happy privilege the citizens of South Carolina are stripped by the twentieth clause of this Judiciary bill, as it now stands. If charged with committing a capital offence against the United States, at a place as far back as the Alleghany mountains, he is carried down to the city of Charleston, far from the aid of his friends, far from his witnesses; and if, in times of civil troubles, he be obnoxious to those in power, to be tried for his life in the fangs of his enemies.

Here he proposed to make some observations on a late publication, when Mr. BOURNOR asked if the gentleman was in order, or if he did not wander from the point in debate? Mr. BURKE said he could not resist what he thought his duty, to make every opposition in his power to the bill; if he failed, he lamented the circumstance, but should pay that deference to the law which every good citizen ought to do.

On putting the question on Mr. LIVERMORE's motion for striking out the third clause of the bill, the House divided: eleven voted for, and thirty-one against it; so it passed in the negative.

The committee rose and reported progress; and then the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, September 1.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they had passed a bill for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, to which they request the concurrence of this House. Also a bill for allowing a compensation to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, and to the officers of both Houses, with several amendments, to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the report from the Committee of Elections of the 18th of August last, relative to the petition of a number of citizens of the State of New Jersey, complaining of the illegality of the election of the members holding seats in this House, as elected within that State, which lie on the table; and after having made some progress therein, Ordered, That the further consideration of the said report be put off until to-morrow.

Permanent Seat

[H. or R.]

WEDNESDAY, September 2.

Several petitions from the inhabitants of Philadelphia, and Bucks and Montgomery counties, in the State of Pennsylvania, were presented to the House and read, praying that the permanent seat of Congress may be established at the place known by the name of Old Philadelphia, on the west side of the river Delaware.

The House resumed the consideration of the report from the Committee of Elections, touching the petition of a number of the citizens of the State of New Jersey, complaining of the illegality of the election of the members holding seats in this House, as elected within that State. Whereupon,

A motion being made, and seconded, that the House do agree to the following resolution:

Resolved, That it appears to the House, upon full and mature consideration, that JAMES SCHUREMAN, LAMBERT CADWALADER, ELIAS BOURNOR, and THOMAS SINTICKSON, were duly elected and returned to serve as Representatives for the State of New Jersey, in the present Congress of the United States:

It was carried in the affirmative.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill for allowing a compensation to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, and to the officers of both Houses.

Resolved, That this House doth disagree to the first, second, and third amendments, and doth agree to all the other amendments to the said bill.

The bill sent from the Senate for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, was read the first time.

Several orders of the day were postponed, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, September 3.

The bill for suspending part of the Collection act was passed, and transmitted to the Senate.

A return of the imports and exports of Georgia was received from George Walton, Esq., Governor of that State, which was ordered to lie on the table.

The bill for the punishment of certain crimes was read the second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

PERMANENT SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, to take into consideration the motion presented by Mr. SCOTT, on Thursday last, for establishing the permanent residence of Congress; Mr. BOURNOR in the Chair.

Mr. GOODHUE.—The motion before the committee I consider too indefinite for the House to decide upon satisfactorily; I wish, therefore, to add something which may bring the question to a point. It is well known that the gentlemen from the Eastward are averse to taking up this business at this time. Not that the subject was improper for our discussion, but that the present session is drawing to a period, and there remains yet much important business to be transacted before the adjournment; but their opinion being overruled by a late vote of the House, they have since taken it into consideration, and are now ready and willing to come to a decision. The Eastern members, with the members from New York, have agreed to fix a place upon national principles, without a regard to their own convenience, and have turned their minds to the banks of the Susquehanna. This is a situation as nearly central as could be devised, upon some of the principles contained in the resolution. It is, however, supposed to be considerably to the southward of the centre of the population. Motives of convenience would have led us to fix upon the banks of the Delaware, but it was supposed it would give more lasting content to go further south. They were, therefore, unitedly of opinion, that the banks of the river Susquehanna should be the place of the permanent residence of the General Government; and that until suitable buildings could be there erected for accommodation, they should remain in the city of New York. Agreeably to these ideas, I move the following resolution:

Resolved, That the permanent seat of the General Government ought to be in some convenient place on the east bank of the river Susquehanna, in the State of Pennsylvania; and that until the necessary buildings be erected for the purpose, the seat of Government ought to continue at the city of New York.

Mr. STONE said it ought to be "Government of the United States," instead of General Government.

Mr. LEE.—The House are now called upon to deliberate on a great national question; and I hope they will discuss and decide it with that dispassionate deliberation which the magnitude of the subject requires. I hope they will be guided in this discussion and decision, by the great principles on which the Government is founded. I have, with a view, therefore, of bringing them before a committee, drawn up a preamble, which recognises them, in the words following:

Whereas the people of the United States have assented to and ratified a Constitution for their Government, to provide for their defence against foreign danger, to secure their perpetual union and domestic tranquillity, and to promote their common interest; and all these great objects will be best effected by establishing the seat of Government in a station as nearly central as a convenient water communication with the Atlantic ocean, and an easy access to the Western territory will permit; and as it will be satisfactory to the people of the United States, and give them a firm confidence in the justice and wisdom of their Government, to be assured that such a station is already in the contemplation of Congress; and that proper measures will be taken to ascertain it, and to provide the necessary accommodations, as soon as the indispensable arrangements for carrying into effect the Constitution can be made, and the circumstances of the United States will permit.

Resolved, That a place, as nearly central as a convenient communication with the Atlantic ocean, and an easy access to the Western territory will permit, ought to be selected and established as the permanent seat of the Government of the United States.

I wish the principles to be recognised, that the people of the United States may be able to judge, whether, in the measures about to be adopted, they are carried into execution by this House. If these great principles are not observed, it will be an unhappy fulfilment of those predictions which have been made by the opponents of the Constitution, that the general interest of America would not be consulted; that partial measures would be pursued; and that, instead of being influenced by a general policy, directed to the good of the whole, one part of the Union would be depressed and trampled on, to benefit and exalt the other. Instead of accomplishing and realizing those bright prospects which shone upon us in the dawn of our Government, and for which our patriots fought and bled, we shall find the whole to be a visionary fancy. I flatter myself, that before the House decides on the question before them, those principles will be recognised, if it is meant they shall be regarded.

Mr. CARROLL seconded Mr. LEE's motion. Mr. SHERMAN said if they were both adopted, or blended together, they would only amount to a preamble, and determine nothing. He thought the first preamble the best, inasmuch as it stated the principles simply and concisely.

Mr. HARTLEY.—Several places have been mentioned, and some have been offered to Congress as proper situations for the Federal Government. Many persons wish it seated on the banks of the Delaware, many on the banks of the Potomac. I consider this as the middle ground between the two extremes. It will suit the inhabitants to the north better than the Potomac could, and the inhabitants to the south better than Delaware would. From this consideration, I am induced to believe, it will be a situation more accommodating and agreeable than any other. Respecting its communication with the Western Territory, no doubt but the Susquehanna will facilitate that object with considerable ease and great advantage; and as to its convenience to the navigation of the Atlantic ocean, the distance is nothing more than to afford safety from any hostile attempt, while it affords a short and easy communication with navigable rivers and large commercial towns. Nay, its intercourse may be without land carriage, if proper measures are pursued to open the navigation to the Delaware and Chesapeake. Perhaps, as the present question is only intended to be on general principles, it may be improper to be more minute than the honorable mover has been; but I think it would be better to come to the point at once, and fix the precise spot, if we could. With this view, I mention Wright's Ferry on the Susquehanna. Not, however, that the House should decide upon it until they have ascertained its advantages, which will, perhaps, come more properly forward when the question on the preamble is determined.

Mr. SPOWICK.—I hope that the motion of the honorable gentleman from Virginia will not obtain. Gentlemen who urged, the other day, to have this business brought on, cannot fail to recollect, that they were called on and entreated to defer this business. They were told, that this was not the time, consistently with the real good of the country, to determine the permanent residence of Congress. They were told, that the Government was not yet in operation, that the Union was not yet complete; that gentleman particularly, and the majority of the House, supposed, that suspending it would occasion so much dissatisfaction and agitation that the peace and happiness of the country required a speedy decision, and it was resolved to bring the business on immediately. I am now ready to meet the gentlemen, and am prepared to decide upon the important subject. I shall oppose the motion of Mr. LEE, because it involves unnecessary alteration.

Mr. VIXING did not consider this resolution as a preamble. It was only settling some general principles, by which the House were to be governed in coming to a final determination. Was there a sentence in the propositions which could be denied? Was it not proper and expedient, that the Government should be fixed at some central place? If that was proper, why not express it? Was it unusual? Was it repugnant to the forms of legislation? What could be the operation of the principles? Every gentleman would have an eye to some fixed and leading maxims. It would regulate and facilitate his conclusions. On these accounts, he was in favor of the motion. He agreed that this was a matter of the highest importance. He wished that all exterior circumstances might combine in aid of the Government, and every principle be attended to which could preserve and add strength to it. While we had a Washington, and his virtues, to cement and guard the Union, it might be safe; but when he should leave us, who would inherit his virtues, and possess his influence? Who would remain to embrace and draw to a centre, those hearts which the authority of his virtues alone kept in union?

Mr. TUCKER felt some embarrassment on this question, and wished to know what gentlemen were going about. It seemed to him that the proposition was a preamble; and he would ask, whether it was customary to agree to a preamble before the substantial part of the resolution was known? The principles mentioned in the preamble, were of such extent as could not be determined; they might lead to consequences about which no member could form an opinion. He wished to know gentlemen's objects before he pledged himself. It was possible he might go with the mover, in agreeing to the result of his propositions; but he could not agree to fetter himself with restraints, or be led blindfolded, even to the truth itself. This mode of reasoning was like the Socratic; he could not discover what was to flow from affirming or denying. It was asking him, if he admitted this proposition and that; until he admitted so much, as to enable his adversary to draw from premises, which he had been allured to grant from their speciousness, conclusions he had never contemplated. He did not like the idea of making laws syllogistically. He hoped, therefore, the gentleman would relinquish all idea of determining on the preamble, until the substantial proposition was agreed to.

Mr. LEE.—I wish to assure the honorable gentleman who spoke last, that fair dealing is my object. I wish to bring forward those considerations which ought to guide our judgments. A question is to be decided which involves present and future interests, and extends to remote generations. The question is to be settled which must determine, whether this Government is to exist for ages, or be dispersed among contending winds. Will gentlemen say these principles ought not to be recognised? Will gentlemen say, that the centre of Government should not be the centre of the Union? Shall it not be a situation which will admit of an easy communication to the ocean? Will they say, that our Western brethren are to be disregarded? These are the momentous considerations which should lead the House to a conclusion. If they are disregarded, it will be an alarming circumstance to the people of the Southern States. They have felt these alarms already. It was with difficulty, on another occasion, that their apprehensions on this score were quieted, and their difficulties surmounted. If this question is decided, without regarding these interests, it will be said, that a Congress is found, who are not disposed to recognise the general principles of the Government. I have come forward with such explicit propositions as the interest of my country dictates. Some principles ought to be previously established as a guide, as a polar star, to lead the committee to just conclusions. I am not for delay. Gentlemen will find, that the proposition contains nothing like delay; when it is adopted, I will come forward with as explicit propositions as the general weal of America demands.

Mr. THATCHER was against a preamble being prefixed to the resolution of the committee, because the House had, on every occasion when preambles were brought forward, rejected them. He thought this a prudent conduct, because it avoided embarrassments. He observed, that it was not unfrequently the case that the preambles occasioned more difficulty in understanding the laws than the most intricate part of the laws themselves; and, therefore, the committee would act wisely to reject such trammels. He conceived, moreover, that the motion was out of order as it was a substitute for one before the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN thought that the committee had better proceed and fix upon the place, than to delay the business, by adopting principles which were not essential to be prefixed; if they were found afterwards necessary they might be added.

Mr. STONE thought the gentleman from South Carolina need not fear the adoption of the principles contained in the motion of the gentleman from Virginia; if the principles were just, there was no fear that the extension of them would lead to any improper decision.

Mr. SEVEY agreed, that the subject was important, and ought to be decided on fixed and acknowledged principles; but he should vote against the adoption of those brought forward by the gentleman from Virginia, because they were anticipated by those laid on the table last week by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He was not, however, impressed with the necessity of having any preamble at all.

Mr. SMITH (of South Carolina) looked upon the motion as a preamble to a preamble, both of which he conceived unnecessary; nay, he doubted the truth of some of the assertions. So far from cementing the Union, by a measure of the kind in contemplation, he rather feared it would have a tendency to rend the Union in two; for which reason he was against adopting it.

Mr. TUCKER wished the proposition might lie on the table, to give gentlemen time to consider it.

Mr. LEE conceived it proper to adopt the preamble as a guide to their decision. No gentlemen pretended to say it contained improper principles. As to the whole being a preamble to a preamble, he did not conceive that to be the case, because the resolution, subsequent to the preamble, decided, that Congress should select a place for their permanent residence. He did not conceive how gentlemen could refuse their assent to a self-evident proposition. He thought such conduct would give an alarm to the inhabitants of the United States; it amounted to a declaration, that, on this important question, they would not be governed by principles founded on rectitude and good policy.

Mr. MADISON.—I cannot, Mr. Chairman, discover why the opposition to my colleague's preamble is so strenuous. Is it contended to be out of order? I submit that to the decision of the Chair. Does it contain any thing which is not true? I appeal, on that point, to the candid judgment of the committee. Are the truths in it applicable to the great object we are about to decide? I appeal to the justice and policy of the people of the United States.

I flatter myself the Chair will decide with me, that the proposition is strictly in order; that the committee will agree, that its contents are substantial truths; and the whole world, that they are applicable to the important point now under consideration.

It declares the principles which ought to govern our decision on this question, and will, therefore, stand properly prefixed to the motion offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Goodhue.) By it we declare our sentiments, and engage to conform to them, in fixing upon a seat for the residence of Congress. Is there any thing improper or unwise in this determination. An honorable gentleman near me (Mr. TUCKER) says, that he feels himself embarrassed on this occasion; that the propositions are a bandage over his eyes, to lead him blindfolded to an object he cannot tell what. I must beg leave to differ from him. They appear to me to contain those luminous truths which ought to guide him through his embarrassment to the object which I am sure his justice and patriotism are in pursuit of. I hope, therefore, he will agree with us in adopting the motion, unless something more essential is offered against it.

Mr. SHERMAN.—The resolution connected with the preamble contains a proposition which, I think, ought not to be adopted. It selects a place, having a convenient water-communication with the Atlantic. Now, it may be just and expedient to fix upon a place at some distance from a navigable river, therefore, it may not agree with the intention of the committee. As to the principles which are to guide our decisions, they are as well expressed in the propositions of the gentleman from Pennsylvania as in the substitute, and as free from ambiguity.

Mr. AMES.—I am at a loss to conceive why the gentlemen from Virginia are so agitated and anxious to press the subject of this resolution. One gentleman has asked, is there anything contained in the proposition which is not true? Is there anything which is not applicable to the subject? And, by way of conclusion, asks, whether the resolution shall not pass? But is such a conclusion necessary to these premises? If they are true, why be so solicitous? Does truth acquire any additional authority from being frequently voted? If they are truths, will not those truths guide us? But I have, sir, another difficulty. If the committee shall vote for these propositions, the gentleman may exhibit other abstract questions for our consideration without limitation, and support them by the same argument. He may ask you, are not these things true? Are they not applicable? And, in this way, we may encounter our journals with all the multifarious propositions which arise out of this fertile subject. But is there any necessity for it? Will it not embarrass the committee? Sir, it is not our business to syllogize upon abstract principles, like school logicians, but to settle facts. I contend, if the principles dilated in the motion are incontrovertibly true there is no use in inserting them.

The question on Mr. LEE's motion was taken, and determined in the negative; Yeas 17, Nays 34.

Mr. TUCKER declared, that the majority for fixing upon any set of principles whatever, could not govern his mind with regard to the fact. If, on the whole, he did not think that place best, which the principles adopted seemed to lead to, he certainly could not vote for it. Of what use, then, was it to establish principles which could not govern the conduct of the House? But the principles offered are vague, and lead to no certain conclusion. What is the centre of wealth, population, and territory? Is there a common centre?—Territory has one centre, population another, and wealth a third. Now, is it intended to determine a centre from these three centres? This was not a practicable mode of settling the place; and it was to be doubted whether the centre of wealth ought at all to be considered. The centre of population is variable, and a decision on that principle now might establish the seat of Government at a very inconvenient place to the next generation. The centre of territory may be ascertained, but that will lead to a situation entirely ineligible; consequently, whether these centres were considered separately or together, they furnish no satisfactory direction, no possible guide to the committee. The only way, then, to come to a result yielding satisfaction, would be to consider the several places to be proposed, according to their merits; and this would be done by gentlemen in the course of the business. He was, therefore, against settling any principles by vote.

Mr. MADISON.—I move to strike out the word wealth, because I do not conceive this to be a consideration that ought to have much weight in determining the place where the seat of Government ought to be. The two other principles, I admit, are such as ought to have their influence; but why wealth should be not so clear. Government is intended for the accommodation of the citizens at large; an equal facility to communicate with Government is due to all ranks; whether to transmit their grievances or requests, or to receive those blessings which the Government is intended to dispense. The rich are certainly not less able than those who are indigent to resort to the seat of Government, or to establish the means necessary for receiving those advantages to which, as citizens, they are entitled.

I should rather suppose, if any distinctions are to be made, or superior advantages to be enjoyed from the presence of the Government, that the Government ought rather to move toward those who are the least able to move toward it, and who stand most in need of its protection.

The question on this motion was taken, and passed in the negative. Yeas 22, Nays 28.

The question on Mr. SCOTT's motion was then taken, and adopted. Yeas 32, Nays 18.

Mr. GOODHUE's motion was now taken into consideration.

Mr. LEE hoped that gentlemen would show how the banks of the Susquehanna conformed with the principles laid down in the resolution adopted by the House; how it communicated with the navigation of the Atlantic, and how it was connected with the Western Territory. He hoped they would point out its other advantages, respecting salubrity of air and fertility of soil. He expected all these advantages ought to be combined in the place of the residence of the Federal Government, and every other requisite to cement the common interest of America.

Mr. HARTLEY wished some gentleman had risen to satisfy the inquiries of the honorable member, who could have given a description of the advantages of that situation in better language than himself. But as no gentleman had offered to undertake the subject, he thought himself bound to make him an answer; and he trusted, in doing this, he should clearly show that all the advantages contemplated would result from adopting the motion. But he wished it had extended further, and selected the place most convenient on the banks of the Susquehanna, as then the answer would be more pointed and decisive. He had already mentioned Wright's Ferry, and would consider that as the proper spot. Now, Wright's Ferry lies on the east bank of the Susquehanna, about thirty-five miles from navigable water; and, from a river, at Lake Osego, in the upper part of the State of New York. The Tyoga branch is navigable a very considerable distance up, and is but a few miles from the Genesee, which empties into Lake Ontario. The Juniata is navigable, and nearly connects with the Kiskiminetas, and that with the Ohio; besides, the west branch connects with the Alleghany river; forming a communication with the distant parts even of Kentucky, with very little land carriage. The great body of water in that river renders it navigable at all seasons of the year. With respect to the settlements in the neighborhood of Wright's Ferry, he would venture to assert that it was as thickly inhabited as any part of the country in North America. As to the quality of the soil, it was inferior to none in the world, and though that was saying a good deal, it was not more than he believed to be a fact. In short, from all the information he had acquired, and that was not inconsiderable, he ventured to pronounce, that in point of soil, water, and the advantages of nature, there was no part of the country superior. And if honorable gentlemen were disposed to pay much attention to a dish of fish, he could assure them their table might be furnished with fine and good from the waters of the Susquehanna; perhaps not in such variety as in this city, but the deficiency was well made up in the abundance which liberal nature presented them of her various products. It was in the neighborhood of two large and populous towns, one of them the largest inland town in America. Added to all these advantages, it possessed that of centrality, perhaps, in a superior degree to any which could be proposed.

Mr. LEE asked the gentleman what was the distance of Wright's Ferry from York Town, and whether that town, as it had once accommodated Congress, could do it again? If a permanent seat is established, why not go to it immediately? And why, let me ask, shall we go and fix upon the banks of a rapid river, when we can have a more healthful situation? And here he would inquire if the Codorus creek, which runs through York Town into the Susquehanna, was or could be made navigable?

Mr. HARTLEY answered, that Yorktown was ten miles from the Ferry, that it contained about five hundred houses, besides a number of large and ornamental public buildings; that there was no doubt, but if Congress deemed it expedient to remove immediately there, they could be conveniently accommodated; but as gentlemen appeared to be inclined to fix the permanent residence on the east bank of the Susquehanna, he was very well satisfied it should be there.

Mr. MADISON.—The gentleman who brought forward this motion was candid enough to tell us, that measures have been preconcerted out of doors, and that the point was determined, that more than half the territory of the United States, and nearly half its inhabitants, have been disposed of, not only without their consent, but without their knowledge. After this, I hope the gentleman will extend his candor so much further as to show that the general principles now to be established are applicable to their determination, in order that we may reconcile this fate to our own minds, and submit to it with some degree of complacency.

Though it was deemed improper to assign the general principles submitted by my colleague, in a preamble, yet I trust they will be unfolded, and explained in the course of argument, and their superiority over those just agreed to demonstrated. But waiving this inquiry for the present, I call upon gentlemen to show, how the principles agreed to apply to the subsequent resolution.

I hope, if the seat of Government is to be at or near the centre of wealth, population, and extent of territory, that gentlemen will show that the permanent seat there proposed is near the permanent centre of wealth, population, and extent of territory, and the temporary seat near the temporary centre. I think we may, with good reason, call upon gentlemen for an explanation on these points, in order that we may know the ground on which the great question is decided, and be able to assign to our constituents satisfactory reasons for what some of them may consider a sacrifice of their interest, and be instrumental in reconciling them, as far as possible, to their destiny.

Mr. GOODHUE thought the question, stated by the gentleman from Virginia, was proper to be asked, and proper to be answered. The gentlemen from the Eastward, as he said before, were in favor of the Susquehanna; that, in contemplating the geographical centre of territory, they found the banks of that river to be near the place. In point of population, they considered the Susquehanna was south of that centre; but, from a spirit of conciliation, they were inclined to go there, although the principle and their own convenience would not lead them beyond the banks of the Delaware. He believed the centre of population would not vary considerably for ages yet to come, because he supposed it would constantly incline more towards the Eastern, and manufacturing States, than towards the Southern, and agricultural ones.

Mr. JACKSON.—I was originally opposed to the question coming forward, and am so still. I thought the subject ought not to be touched till the States who have not yet acceded to the Union might have an opportunity of giving their voice. I agree with the gentleman from Virginia. I am sorry that the people should learn that this matter has been precipitated; that they should learn, that the members from New England and New York had fixed on a seat of Government for the United States. This is not proper language to go out to freemen. Jealousies have already gone abroad. This language will blow the coals of sedition, and endanger the Union. I would ask, if the other members of the Union are not also to be consulted? Are the Eastern members to dictate in this business, and fix the seat of Government of the United States? Why not also fix the principles of Government? Why not come forward, and demand of us the power of Legislation, and say, give us up your privileges, and we will govern you? If one part has the power to fix the seat of Government, they may as well take the Government from the other.

This looks like aristocracy: not the united, but the partial voice of America is to decide. How can gentlemen answer for this, who call themselves representatives, on the broad basis of national interest?

I deny the fact of the territorial centrality of the place proposed. From New York, to the nearest part of the Province of Maine, it is two hundred and fifty miles; and from New York, to the nearest part of the upper district of Georgia, from which my colleague (General MATTHEWS) comes, is eleven hundred miles; and from the proposed place on the Susquehanna, it is four hundred miles to the nearest part of Maine, and nine hundred to the nearest part of that district; the proportion is more than two to one. But the gentlemen should have an eye to the population of Georgia; one of the finest countries in the world cannot but rapidly extend her population: nothing but her being harassed by the inroads of savages has checked her amazing increase, which must, under the auspices of peace and safety, people her western regions. Georgia will soon be as populous as any State in the Union. Calculations ought not to be made on its present situation.

North Carolina is not yet in the Union, and perhaps the place may give umbrage to her, which ought, at this moment, to be cautiously avoided. I should, therefore, think it most advisable to postpone the decision for this session, at least. But, if we are to decide, I own, I think the Potomac a better situation than the Susquehanna, and I hope it will be selected for that purpose.

Mr. GOODRICH.—If gentlemen examine this subject with candor, they will find that the banks of the Susquehanna are as near the geographical centre as can be fixed upon. It is from the extreme of the Province of Maine about seven hundred and sixty miles; to Savannah, in Georgia, about seven hundred and sixty; and about seven hundred and thirty, or seven hundred and forty, from Kentucky; so that it is rather South of the centre of territory.

Mr. LAWRENCE.—When this subject was under discussion some time since, it appeared to be the wish of gentlemen from the Eastward, and of the members from this State, that the question should not now be decided. They urged several reasons why it would be improper. I thought those reasons weighty, and was for postponing the consideration till our next meeting. But it was answered, that the business was important; that the citizens of the United States were uneasy and anxious; that as factions did not now exist, it was the proper time to decide the question. What was the representation to do? Was it not necessary for them to consult, and fix upon a proper place?

They are, in a degree, disinterested, because they have no expectation that the seat of Government will be fixed in any of the Eastern States. On the other hand, there is a well-grounded expectation, that it will be fixed either in Virginia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, or Jersey. We are called on to determine a question in which we conceive ourselves unbiased, and shall decide it on those principles that will reflect honor on the House. I trust it will be found that we have fixed on those principles, and that this resolution will be confirmed by Congress. We do not decide for the Union, nor for the Southern States, we decide for ourselves; and if our reasons are substantial, I trust that gentlemen will meet us in the determination.

There are several principles which have been agreed to in the general resolution; and I believe it will be shown with exactness, that the place proposed will come within these principles. The first respects population. Is the House to consider the present, or the expected population? The resolution has a determinate meaning; it speaks of the population at the present period; and to calculate on this principle no gentleman can say is unjust. The representation in this House is itself a demonstration of it. The population of this country may be pretty safely determined by the proportion of representatives in this House; for it is established on this ground. I therefore believe, that the principle of population inclines to this place, in preference to a more southern situation.

But in taking the principle of territory, are the House to calculate on the uninhabited wilderness? Shall they take the Lake of the Woods on one side, and the Missouri on the other, and find a geographical centre? If so, to what an extent must they go? The inhabited and populated part of the country ought chiefly to be considered. If St. Croix is taken as the eastern limit, and St. Mary as the southern, the centre of the line will be found to fall pretty near the Susquehanna.

Another important consideration is, that this centre is on navigable water, sufficiently removed from the Atlantic coast, and from access by sea, so as to ensure security. With respect to the Western country, its situation is convenient and favorable, having a communication by land and water practicable and easy, more practicable, perhaps, than any other route. But another principle shall be attended to. It has been hinted that this ought not to govern; but I think it of some importance. Gentlemen should look to those parts of the country where the greatest population is, the commercial and opulent cities, and see where is the substantial wealth, the strength of the Union; means by which the United States are to be protected, and the sources from which the Government is to draw its principal supports; it will be found that the seat of these will be the Northern and Eastern States.

Had the Eastern members consulted their own interests, they would have chosen the banks of the Delaware for the seat of Government; but they knew it would not be deciding on those generous principles which might be expected; they likewise knew that there was one State, not yet in the Union, to which such a measure would give disgust.

Mr. SARGENT.—I beg leave to ask, if there really is any impropriety in gentlemen's consulting together, who have an uniformity of interest upon a question which has been said to be of such infinite importance? My colleague has barely stated that such a consultation has taken place, and that, in consequence of it, men's minds have been induced to run in a current. Is there anything wrong in this? Let those, then, who are determined not to consult, nor have any communication on such a subject, decide for themselves. I should think myself lost to that regard I owe to my country, and to my immediate constituents in particular, should I abstract myself from the contemplation of the benefits that would flow from knowing the feelings and sentiments of those with whom I am to act. Instead of being an evidence to that aristocratic spirit which has been mentioned, it is only a proof that men, attentive to their business, had preferred that way which every honest man had in view. I have contemplated the subject with great anxiety, and though I cannot declare that my local situation has had no influence on my mind, yet I will say, I endeavored to prevent its having any. I believe that the true interests of the country will be best answered by taking a position eastward and northward of the Susquehanna.

The Delaware is one extreme, the Potomac another; but when I reflect how anxious some gentlemen are for the one, and some for the other, I am willing to accommodate both parties, by advancing to a middle ground, to which I hope the public mind will be reconciled. I was also influenced in fixing this opinion by the sentiment of the celebrated Montesquieu. He had laid it down, that in a country partaking of northern and southern interests, of a poor and productive soil, the centre and the influence of Government ought to incline to that part where the former circumstances prevailed; because necessity stimulates to industry, produces good habits, and a surplus of labor; because such parts are the nurseries of soldiers and sailors, and the sources of that energy which is the best security of the Government.

The Susquehanna is, in my opinion, southwest of the centre of wealth, population, and resources of every kind. I would beg leave, gentlemen, to suggest another idea. In my view, on the principles of population, the Susquehanna is far beyond the centre; for I do not think it just, on this subject, to take the Constitutional computation. Will any gentlemen pretend, that men, who are merely the subject of property or wealth, should be taken into the estimate; that the slaves of the country, men who have no rights to protect, (being deprived of them all,) should be taken into view, in determining the centre of Government? If they were considered, gentlemen might as well estimate the black cattle of New England.

I would ask, if it is of no importance to take a position in which the credit of the Government may procure those supplies that its necessities might require? Will the strength and riches of the country be to the north or to the south of the Susquehanna? Certainly to the north.

It is the opinion of all the Eastern States, that the climate of the Potomac is not only unhealthy, but destructive to northern constitutions. It is of importance to attend to this, for whether it be true or false, such is the public prepossession. Vast numbers of Eastern adventurers have gone to the Southern States, and all have found their graves there; they have met destruction as soon as they arrived. These accounts have been spread, and filled the Northern people with apprehension.

With regard to the temporary residence, I at first had very little concern where it should be; but, I believe, if Government should take a temporary stand, so central as Philadelphia, the accommodations of that State would be so seducing, and the interest of that powerful State so strong, that it would be more difficult ever to remove Congress from it, than it would be from a place which is acknowledged to be improper for their permanent seat.

Mr. VINING.—Although I must acknowledge myself a party to the bargain, yet I had no share in making it. It is to me an unexpected bargain. Though the interest of the State which I have the honor to represent is involved in it, I am yet to learn of the committee, whether Congress are to tinkle the trout on the stream of the Codorus, to build their sumptuous palaces on the banks of the Potomac, or to admire commerce with her expanded wings, on the waters of the Delaware. I have, on this occasion, educated my mind to impartiality, and have endeavored to chastise its prejudices.

I confess to the House, and to the world, that, viewing this subject, with all its circumstances, I am in favor of the Potomac. I wish the seat of Government to be fixed there; because I think the interest, the honor, and the greatness of this country require it. I look on it as the centre from which those streams are to flow that are to animate and invigorate the body politic. From thence, it appears to me, the rays of Government will most naturally diverge to the extremities of the Union. I declare that I look on the Western Territory in an awful and striking point of view. To that region the unpurged sons of earth are flowing from all quarters. Men, to whom the protection of the laws, and the controlling force of the Government, are equally necessary; from this great consideration, I conclude that the banks of the Potomac are the proper station.

With respect to the temporary residence, the accommodations which have been mentioned operate as reasons against New York. / It is, indeed, but too agreeable; its allurements are too dangerous; when I look round I see such handsome arguments addressed to my feelings, that my understanding dreads their impression, and I feel at a loss to determine on a central temporary residence; but the inducement to remain at New York, arising from these considerations, do not, perhaps, apply with any force, to detain a deliberative and serious Legislative body. They, perhaps, tend to repel them from such a centre, as incompatible with the circumstances necessary for them to pursue.

Mr. SENEY mentioned Peach Bottom, on the Susquehanna, about fifteen miles above tide-water, as the proper place. Mr. GOUGH did not wish the particular spot pointed out, because some inconvenience would result from such a measure; however, he was free to declare, that his own idea was in favor of a situation near Wright's Ferry.

Mr. HEISTER moved to insert Harrisburg in the resolution. He conceived this spot to be more eligible than any yet mentioned; from hence there was an uninterrupted navigation to the sources of the river, and through this place runs the great Western road leading to Fort Pitt, and the Western Territory. A water communication can be effected at a small expense with Philadelphia. The waters of the Swetara, a branch of the Susquehanna, about eight miles below Harrisburg, run to the north-east, and are navigable fifteen miles from thence to the Tulpehocken, a branch of the Schuylkill, a canal may be cut across, of about a mile and a half, the ground has been actually surveyed, and found practicable; this will unite the Susquehanna and Delaware, and open a passage for the produce of an immense tract of country. It is but little further from Philadelphia than Wright's Ferry; and, on many accounts, he thought it a preferable situation for the permanent seat of Government.

Mr. SEDGWICK wished the resolution might be adopted as it stood, without alteration. Mr. FITZSIMONS hoped the committee would not now determine on the particular spot, as it might be attended with some inconveniences. Mr. HARTLEY asked his colleague (Mr. HEISTER) if he could fix upon any spot near Harris's narrow strip of land between the Susquehanna and Paxton creek was certainly inadequate.

Mr. PAGES wished the committee to rise, in order to give the gentlemen an opportunity of making up their minds as to the particular spot. If they agreed in this, as they had done with respect to the other matter they had brought forward, they would save the time of the committee; in the interim, the House might return to the consideration of the subjects they had before them, and which were not yet settled, by an accommodation either in or out of the House.

Mr. MANISON.—I hope the committee will not rise for the purpose mentioned by my colleague; but that they do it in order to give gentlemen time to consider the facts that have been brought into view, and with which it will be necessary to contrast other facts, yet to be mentioned, by those who wish to bring forward all the truths relative to the great question now under consideration. I hope there is no desire among the gentlemen who have made up their minds on this subject, a subject admitting as great a variety of considerations as any subject that has or can come before us, to bring it to a decision in a few hours after it has been disclosed. This would be so different from their usual candor, that I cannot suspect any serious opposition will be made to the rising of the committee.

Mr. AMES flattered himself the committee would not rise, as there could be no doubt but gentlemen were prepared to decide the question; it had been brought into view a considerable time since, and the gentlemen who now wished for delay, had been pressing to have it determined. It was urged, that the public anxiously expected the measure; and though many wished it suspended, yet the major voice was in favor of expedition. He conceived that all the facts necessary to be known were within the reach of the committee, and that it was not necessary to postpone, in order to introduce any evidence to establish them. He apprehended nothing was intended by the rising of the committee but delay, and then the subject would come forward again, with all the unfortunate circumstances of local attachments. He hoped, as the committee had proceeded so far as to adopt the general principles, they would go on, and agree to the subsequent resolution which was proposed by his colleague.

Mr. MANISON meant to pay due attention to every argument that could be urged on this important question. Facts had been asserted, the impressions of which he wished to be erased, if they were not well founded. It has been said, that the communication with the Western Territory, by the Susquehanna, is more convenient than by the Potomac. I apprehend this is not the case; and the propriety of our decision will depend, in a great measure, on the superior advantages of one of these two streams. It is agreed, on all hands, that we ought to have some regard to the convenience of the Atlantic navigation. Now, to embrace this object, a position must be taken on some navigable river; to favor the communication with the Western Territory, its arms ought likewise to extend themselves towards that region. I did not suppose it would have been necessary to bring forward charts and maps, as has been done by others, to show the committee the comparative situation of those rivers. I flattered myself it was sufficiently understood, to enable us now inclined to believe, that gentlemen have embraced an error, and I hope they are not determined to vote under improper impressions. I venture to pledge myself for the demonstration, that the communication with the Western Territory, by the Potomac, is more certain and convenient than the other. And if the question is as important as it is admitted to be, gentlemen will not shut their ears to information; they will not precipitate the decision; or if they regard the satisfaction of our constituents, they will allow them to be informed of all the facts and arguments that lead to the decision of a question in which the general and particular interests of all parts of the Union are involved.

Mr. STONE found gentlemen had determined on a step that was not generally liked; he wished, therefore, the committee to rise, and give all of them an opportunity of trying to mend the bargain that had been made; perhaps they might find, upon reflection, that they ought to decide the question upon more national principles than they seemed yet to be governed by.

Permanent Seat of Government.

[H. or R.]

Mr. SENEY could not say how far the motion was agreeable to every part of America; but he believed it would be acceptable to a very considerable part of the State he had the honor to represent.

Mr. SUMTER was in favor of the committee's rising, in order to give gentlemen time to ascertain the facts necessary to guide them to a decision. There was one impropriety which struck him forcibly; the resolution adopted as a principle that the seat of Government ought to be in a convenient place for the navigation of the Atlantic ocean. But the situation mentioned in the resolution under consideration had no communication whatever with the Atlantic navigation. It had been said, that the Susquehanna afforded the most convenient communication with the Western Territory. He believed the Hudson possessed superior advantages; it connected with the country about the Lakes and the Ohio. From New York to Albany was navigable; from thence to Schenectady, there was a short portage; after ascending Schenectady, there was a short portage of half a mile to the Mohawk; from thence, another short portage to Wood Creek, and thence into Lake Ontario, which connects with Lake Erie; from thence are portages to the Wabash, Miami, Muskingum, or Alleghany, all advantages superior to these; and was, both on account of communicating with the Atlantic and Western Territory, much to be preferred to the Susquehanna. He assured gentlemen that he was unbiased in giving a preference to the Potomac; because, if he studied his own convenience, he should consider New York as more eligible than either. It accommodated the Atlantic navigation in a superior manner, and had its pretensions to a connexion with the Western waters, as he had already shown. He hoped, however, that the subject would be debated with candor and good temper, and decided in the way most likely to promote the general interests and harmony of the Union.

Mr. SHERMAN was against taking up the subject so soon; but since it had been determined against him, and gentlemen, he presumed, had endeavored to make up their minds, he had turned his attention to it, and was now prepared to decide. Mr. CLYMER knew the advantages possessed by the Susquehanna in communicating with the Western country, they were mentioned by his colleague; but, with the additional circumstance that the Juniata branch afforded a convenient navigation to a road lately laid out by the State of Pennsylvania, which connected with the Kiskaminitas, from whence was a short voyage down the Alleghany, and shorter still down that to the Ohio, at Pittsburg. He questioned much if the navigation by the Potomac was so convenient.

Mr. STONE did not mean to govern his vote on this occasion by what was said to be the sense of the citizens of Maryland; because they were, he apprehended, divided in opinion. One part or the other would be particularly benefited, as the seat of Government should be fixed either on the Susquehanna or Potomac, because those rivers watered its territory. Perhaps the majority of the present inhabitants would prefer the Susquehanna; but as their settlements extended westward, and the population increased, the majority would be favored by the Potomac.

Mr. SENEY did not mean to determine this question on the principle of benefiting, exclusively, the citizens of Maryland; he considered himself as a Representative of the Union, and should decide on the principle of general convenience.

Mr. TUCKER hoped the committee would rise, in order to give gentlemen time to consider the subject maturely, and to prepare themselves to come forward and discuss, fairly and fully, the advantages and disadvantages of the rival places. He could not believe they meant to decide a question of this importance on the superficial discussion which had taken place.

Mr. MANISON hoped that gentleman did not mean to press the decision after what had been said. He assured them, that he was led to answer some of the observations that had been made, which he was not, at this moment, prepared to do; but, if he was, could gentlemen expect he would enter upon it at this late hour, and when the patience of the committee was exhausted? If he were to do so, he appealed to their candor to say, whether it was likely he should have a patient hearing. The hour of adjournment was so nearly arrived, that it allowed no time for a reply. He called upon them to exercise the candor they were wont to do on inferior subjects, and he pledged himself to come forward to discuss the subject, and answer gentlemen at a future day, even on the next day. He did not know what the event might be; but he thought it would be a criterion by which an opinion might be formed of the accommodating spirit of the House.

The question, on the committee's rising, was now put, and it passed in the negative; for it 23, against it 27.

Mr. STONE.—We are called upon, sir, to determine a question that has not been introduced to our notice more than two hours and a half; a question, too, as admitted on both sides, of the highest importance to the interests and harmony of the Union. I cannot help thinking it a hardship to be compelled so abruptly to a decision; but since it must be the case, I shall take the liberty of suggesting a few of my thoughts, in order to justify the vote I mean to give.

There are a variety of considerations and doubts in my mind, respecting the two rivers that have been mentioned. These doubts are increased when a particular place is named upon one of them; but had gentlemen told us, that they had settled this point also, it might have precluded any sort of debate whatever; because when an agreement had taken place, not only as to the banks of the Susquehanna, but as to the favored spot on those banks, we should not have entertained a single hope that we could have changed the position. But, as gentlemen differ among themselves on this point, perhaps they will permit us to participate with them in selecting the place most likely to give general satisfaction. But how can they suppose we are prepared on this head, without a general consideration of all the places which may offer themselves along the east bank of the river?

I am not apprised, sir, of the extent of this continent certainly, because I never calculated it by figures, or measured it on the map; but if there is the smallest degree of accuracy in the draft that has been handed about, no man, who takes a view of it, in my opinion, will doubt a single moment, whether the Susquehanna is the river, which nearly equally divides the territory of the United States, in its extent north and south, that separates, in equal parts, the country east and west. The Eastern part, I take it, is little, if any thing, more than half as large as what lies west. We observe that the course of the main branch tends more toward the Atlantic ocean, than it does toward the Western Territory; but even its Western inclination goes only towards lakes Erie and Ontario, through the middle of which runs the boundary line of the United States. How can this, then, be supposed a direct or convenient communication with that part of the country which is usually termed, and is, in fact, the Western Territory?

Mr. STONE stopped here, in his argument, and said, he would wait till gentlemen were inclined to give him a hearing. He hardly expected, however, that his observations were agreeable to them; but they must excuse him, as they had forced him to rise, at this time, by their precipitation.

After waiting some time, till order was restored, he proceeded.

In fixing the permanent residence, we ought not only to have in view the immediate importance of the States, but also what is likely to be their weight at a future day; not that we should consider a visionary importance or chimerical expectation, but such a one as can be demonstrated with as much certainty as effects follow their causes. I apprehend the increase of population to the Eastward is merely conditional; there is nothing to invite people to settle in the Northern parts of this continent, in preference to the Southern; even if they were settled there, every principle which encourages population would operate to induce them to emigrate to the Southern and Western parts. We know the Northern climate is severe, the Winters long, and Summers short, and that the soil is less fertile. Were we not assuredly acquainted that this was the case on the continent of America, we should be led to the same conclusion, by reasoning from our knowledge of the other parts of the globe. Men multiply in proportion to the means of support, and this is more abundant in a mild than a severe climate. Hence, I infer, that the climate, and means of subsistence, will ever operate as a stimulus to promote the population of the Southern, in preference to the Northern States. This doctrine is daily exemplified. If we advert to the situation of that part of the Western country called Kentucky, and compare its increase of population since the war, with any part of the Eastern States, we shall find men multiplied there beyond any thing known in America; and if we consider its natural advantages, we shall conclude it will be an important part of the Union. The river which has been mentioned by the Southern gentlemen is, as far as I am acquainted, extremely well calculated to furnish Government with the key of that country; and a river, I believe, richer in its exports than any I have contemplated on the face of the earth.

A call was now made to order, and Mr. STONE sat down.

A desultory conversation took place on the point of order. It was contended that the question was on the insertion of "Harrisburg," in the proposition offered by Mr. GOODRICH, whereas Mr. STONE was speaking to the main question.

Messrs. CARROLL, LEE, and MADISON, insisted that Mr. STONE was in order, inasmuch as Mr. HEISTER's motion necessarily involved the main question, and was inseparable from it.

But it was decided by the Chair to be out of order; whereupon the question "Harrisburg," and out further debate, on inserting "Harrisburg," and it was determined in the negative.

The main question being now before the committee—

Mr. STONE proceeded. I feel myself unhappy to be obliged to address gentlemen who are not disposed to attend to any thing I may say; but as gentlemen have chosen this time for discussing the subject, they will not think it improper in me to persist in detailing my ideas.

When I was interrupted by the call to order, I was about to show the importance of the Potomac to the United States. Its waters afford a practical, safe, and short communication with the Ohio and Mississippi, beyond comparison preferable to the Susquehanna. If it is intended that the people settled upon those great rivers should communicate with the General Government, after ascending the former they must proceed a vast distance northward, up the Alleghany, against a rapid stream, before they can reach the Susquehanna. I am inclined to believe a land-carriage would be better than such a laborious round-about water communication.

Now, the Potomac, as I am informed, connects with the Youghogany, a river less rapid than the Alleghany, and is itself communicable with the Atlantic. In this case, the Potomac will be the highway of such vast quantities of wealth as to give every superiority; and, however we may determine at this day, it will not be long before the seat of Government must be carried thither. The vast population that is extending itself through the western country requires that the Government should take a position favorable to its convenience; because new settlements at a vast distance from the old are more exposed to temptation than others; but, in the present case, it is proper for us to guard against the operation of a foreign country, which seems to be forming settlements near our frontiers to rival ours. If may be the more necessary, inasmuch as we ought to keep the boundary line distinct between the Spaniards and savages, as I fear, do what we will, we run the greatest risk of entering into a quarrel with them; for, it is well known, that emigrants, in forming new settlements, are not much concerned about an ascertainment of jurisdiction; they are generally bold, enterprising spirits, who feel some aversion to strict government; it is therefore necessary that the Government should approach toward them, and be placed in such situation as would give it the greatest possible influence over them. Beside their contiguity to a rival nation, they are independent in their condition; they want hardly any thing this country can give; their soil is rich and fertile; their exports will furnish them with every foreign article from the southward which they can require. Their interests are more strongly connected with the Southern States than the Southern States are with the Eastern.

Permanent Seat

The advantages of this Government are felt in a peculiar manner by the mercantile and commercial States; the agricultural States have not the same strong reasons for maintaining the Union. Hence we may apprehend that the western country may be inclined, as it advances its importance, to drop off. The Susquehanna is no bond by which to hold them, its direction is more northern than western. Upon the whole, I am inclined to believe that it would not give general satisfaction at the present day; and the inequality would daily grow more striking, until we should be compelled to remove again to where there was a probability of finding a centre of territory as well as population.

I have thrown out these ideas in a crude manner, but gentlemen have forced me to it by their urgency to take the question. I could wish to be allowed time for further discussion, and I believe it would be no ill sacrifice of a day, if we were to put off the determination till to-morrow.

Mr. LEE observed, that since gentlemen would not admit of a moment's delay—since they seemed to declare that they had settled the matter without giving an opportunity for full discussion; since the House were hurried to a decision on a point that involved the welfare of the community—duty to his country, duty to the better half of the territory of the United States, called on him to come forward with another proposition.

He then moved to strike out the words "east bank of the Susquehanna," and to insert a clause to this effect:

"That, whereas the banks of the Potomac united all the aforesaid advantages, with fertility of soil, salubrity of climate, &c.—

"Resolved, That the permanent seat of Government ought to be fixed somewhere on the banks of the said river."

He flattered himself that these two rival places would be considered with an attention that would do honor to the House; that their several advantages would be fully compared, and that such a decision would result as would be for the lasting benefit of the United States.

He then stated at large the comparative advantages of the Potomac, its great and increasing improvements, the extent of its navigation, its direct communication with the western country, and its easy communication with the Eastern and Southern States.

The House, he said, were now to determine whether regard was to be had to the people of the Western territory, to the greater portion of the territory of the Union; in point of climate it was extremely salubrious; in fertility of soil, it was exceeded by no country on earth. Thither would emigrants flock from all quarters.

He asked whether this Government was intended for a temporary or a lasting one? Whether it was to be a fleeting vision, or to continue for ages? He hoped the result would proclaim that the Government was calculated for perpetuity; and that the common interest of the country had been consulted. If that was done, the Government would be removed to the Potomac; if not, we should stop short of it; and what would be the consequence? He said he was averse to sound alarms, or introduce terrors into the House; but if they were well founded, he thought it his duty. It was well known with what difficulty the Constitution was adopted by the State of Virginia. It was then said, that there would be confederacies of the States east of Pennsylvania, which would destroy the Southern States; that they would unite their councils in discussing questions relative to their particular interests, and the Southern States would be disregarded. To these suspicions, it was answered, no! It was contended that the magnanimous policy, arising from mutual interests and common dangers, would unite all the States, and make them pursue objects of general good. But if it should be found that there were such confederacies as were predicted, that the Northern States did consult their partial interests, and form combinations to support them, without regarding their Southern brethren, they would be alarmed, and the faith of all south of the Potomac would be shaken. It would be shown to them, that what had been predicted by the enemies to the Constitution had come to pass; that the Northern States had not waited till the Government was organized before they sacrificed the Southern people to their own interests.

Let the seat of Government be fixed where it may, Virginia had not solicited Congress to place the seat of Government in her State. She only contended, that the interests of the Southern and Western country should be consulted; and he declared that these interests would be sacrificed, if Congress fixed upon any place but the Potomac. The greater part of Virginia was distant from that river. Many parts were not nearer than New Jersey. She wished not to have the seat on the Potomac but for the general good; it was not for the benefit of that State, but for the benefit of the Union.

Mr. LAWRENCE said it was improper and unnecessary to hold out terrors to the fancy of members. The true way to convince them was to address their understandings. He was certain as their convenience would allow. I am convinced that going further than the Atlantic States would injure the Western country itself.

The communication which the several rivers have with that country has been brought into view; and, from what I have heard, I am led to suppose, that the House would incline to fix upon one that furnished such a convenience. This disposition, if carried into execution, will, perhaps, do perfect justice to that country, and as much as the inhabitants can expect; the question, however, seems to lie between the Susquehanna and the Potomac. Taking the extent of the sea-coast line, as he mentioned before, and erecting a perpendicular at the middle, it would strike between those two rivers at nearly equal distances, though rather nearer the Potomac than the Susquehanna. With these rivers I am tolerably acquainted; the latter communicates immediately with the northern lakes, but much of the country is a desert wilderness; the communication between the southern branch of the Tioga and a branch of the Alleghany, the head waters of which approach very near each other, and this passes Fort Pitt, which we are to consider as the key to the western country. But, unfortunately, this route is four hundred miles against the stream; a distance too great to afford an easy intercourse with that country; a land communication would be preferable. The Potomac offers itself under the following circumstances: From the falls up the main river to Will's Creek, is about two hundred miles; from thence is a portage to the Monongahany, down which you descend to the Chesapeake, which meets the Alleghany at Fort Pitt, and forms the great river Ohio. This is a direct communication between the Atlantic and Western country. So, on the return, you have but sixty miles against the stream up the Monongahela, and you have a short portage from the Cheat river to very good boatable water on the Potomac; but, to return by the way of the Susquehanna, you have four hundred miles up the Alleghany to the portage across to the southern branch of the Tioga, and four hundred down that river and the Susquehanna, before you come to the Atlantic navigation; hence I conclude that there is no comparison between the two rivers. The Potomac will, no doubt, afford the most safe and convenient communication; but it does not follow that the seat of Congress should be on the banks of that river, because it may not be of general importance; but, if it was, I consider that the Susquehanna is a great and valuable river, it communicates with many millions of acres of land and water, the principal part of my native State; this, added to the circumstance of centrality, as it respects the wealth and population of America, determines me to give my vote in favor of it; but if I was to study the particular interest of that part of the State from which I come, perhaps I should more substantially benefit it by voting for the Potomac.

Mr. Madison said, if this delay should not have produced any alteration in the sentiments of hitherto shown? This manner of proceeding would mark a genius in this body which will contradict the expectations of its warmest friends. I hope nothing will be fixed by a hasty determination. I said before, and repeat it again, that I wish to make some observations on what has been advanced, for which at present there is not time. But, if there was, I do not wish to address a determined and silent majority. No, sir, if this be the temper of to-day, let me appeal to a more favorable temper to-morrow. If gentlemen refuse this appeal, I must submit; but I will, to the last moment, assert my right, and remonstrate against a precipitate decision.

Mr. Ames said he remembered, when this subject came before the House the other day, when we solicited for delay, it was observed, that the necessities of the Union required an immediate decision; that it would take up but little time; that the proper centre might be easily ascertained; that it would depend upon geographical calculation, and that little discussion would be necessary. Now, when circumstances appear to be changed, when the calculation is made, when the House are ready to vote, gentlemen come forward and pretend that they want time. He hoped the question would be now decided. While he was up, he would observe that he did not entertain a doubt of the patriotism and good intentions of the gentlemen from Virginia. He believed, however, that their judgments were influenced by their wishes, for they seemed to be engaged with a degree of eagerness, which none else appeared to feel; the very language of their motion declares this. They seem to think the banks of the Potomac a paradise, and that river an Euphrates. He had been told it was a fine spot, and he sincerely wished those blessings might ever reside there.

Mr. Burke observed, that the Northern States had had a fortnight to manage this matter, and would not now allow the Southern States a day. What was the conduct of gentlemen? A league has been formed between the Northern States and Pennsylvania.

Mr. Fitzsimons interrupted Mr. Burke, and denied the assertion, as it respected Pennsylvania. Mr. Burke then proceeded, and said that the Eastern members had combined with some other States, he could not positively say which; but the first information that was furnished was given this morning, every gentleman had heard it as well as himself, but that had nothing to do with his object; he wanted time to get information; and called on gentlemen, for the honor of the House, to comply with this request.

Mr. Wadsworth said, he rejoiced to hear the gentlemen calling for time, and crying out fair play. He remembered when he entreated the gentleman who spoke last, and others, not to precipitate themselves into this situation, his entreaties had been of no avail. Knowing that the pride of a majority was one of those things to which he had to submit, he, with all the New England members, solicited for time. With respect to bargaining, he believed that it would there was no dangerous confederacy which the gentleman had talked of; and believed the conduct of the Northern States would bear the strictest scrutiny; that, if probed to the bottom, it would be found fair and candid. He remembered in the debate upon the Tonnage bill, a gentleman from Virginia observed, that could the moderate and equal policy of that day's proceedings have been foreseen in the convention of Virginia, many objections that were there produced against the Constitution would have been thereby obviated. He trusted that, in conducting the business before them, gentlemen could find no cause, eventually, to entertain different sentiments from what he then delivered.

Mr. Madison.—I acknowledge, that, on a former day, I made the observation alluded to, with singular complacency. I said, I had found a moderation and liberality prevailing here, which I sincerely believed, if foreseen in the convention of Virginia, would have obviated a very powerful objection to the adoption of the Federal Constitution. But, give me leave now to say, that if a prophet had risen in that body, and brought the declarations and proceedings of this day into view, that I as firmly believe Virginia might not have been a part of the Union at this moment.

A motion was now made for the committee to rise, and several gentlemen said, they wished it to prevail, in order that an opportunity might be afforded for a fuller discussion.

Mr. Spangwick hoped the committee would not rise. Will it be contended, that the majority shall not govern; and shall the minority, because they cannot carry their points, accuse the House of want of candor? Are we to be told, that an important State would not have joined the Union, had they known what would have been the proceedings of this House. Gentlemen have brought forward this business themselves; they have precipitated the House into it. We prayed, we supplicated for time; and now gentlemen, from some causes not explained, wish to postpone the matter, in order to have time to deliberate. He believed that a deliberation of six weeks would not alter a single opinion, and therefore it was not proper to consume the public time uselessly.

Mr. Madison.—When I alluded to the proceedings of this day, I contemplated the manner in which the business was conducted; and though I acknowledge that a majority ought to govern, yet they have no authority to deprive the minority of a Constitutional right; they have no authority to deprive us the right of free debate. An important and interesting question being under consideration, we ought to have time allowed for its discussion. Facts have been stated on one side, and members ought to be indulged on the other with an opportunity of collecting and ascertaining other facts. We have a right to bring forward all the arguments which we think can, and ought to have an influence on the decision. It is unusual, on a partial discussion, even of questions of inferior magnitude, to decide in the course of a single day. How, then, can gentlemen reconcile their conduct of this day to the liberality they have reflect no honor on either side of the House. He said he must either give his vote now, or submit to more bargaining. He was willing that the whole business of bargaining should be exposed; he would not excuse himself; he did not dare to go to the Potomac. He feared that the whole of New England would consider the Union as destroyed. Since the matter had been so prematurely brought on, since members had been forced, and, as it were, dragged by the throat to this business, he hoped it was now finished.

The question was now put, on the rising of the committee, and carried: Whereupon the committee rose and reported progress, and then the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, September 4.

SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the resolution for establishing a permanent seat of Government, Mr. Boudinot in the Chair.

Mr. Stone wished to hear the sentiments of the gentleman who first brought forward this business. He expected to derive some advantage from that gentleman's knowledge of the country, which, he presumed, was pretty accurate, as it was derived from actual observation.

After waiting some time, Mr. Stone repeated his request, under an apprehension that he had not the honor of being heard by the worthy gentleman.

Mr. Goodhue rose and said, he had given his sentiments yesterday, but, if the gentleman desired it, he was ready to repeat them.

Mr. Stone said, he addressed his request to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. Scott.—I understood the gentleman so, and I have no objection to giving my sentiments on the occasion. The resolution I laid on the table has been honored with the vote of a majority of the committee. It contains such principles as, I believe, ought to govern in the settlement of the grand question: They have declared, that they mean to be governed by these principles, and this is a declaration to the world that their hearts are good. What may follow in consequence of that resolution, cannot impeach the motive, it can only prove, that our heads are uninformed; an error of the head is pardonable; but an error of the heart is not easily forgiven.

Whether the spot which has been moved is the right spot or not, seems to be the matter under inquiry. I had prepared myself with documents, which I should have produced had they been needed, to prove, that the State I have the honor to represent involves, within its limits, the centre of wealth and population of the United States, taking the sea coast for a guide; for all that has been said of the importance of the Western country, has not prevailed on me to imagine that all the vacant territory should be taken into view, the same as the settled and cultivated parts; my resolution had no other idea but that the Atlantic States should consent to go as near that territory the gentlemen, it will at least soften that hard decision which seems to threaten the friends of the Potomac. He hoped that all would concur in the great principle on which they ought to conduct and decide this business; an equal attention to the rights of the community. No Government, he said, not even the most despotic, could, beyond a certain point, violate that idea of justice and equal right which prevailed in the mind of the community. In Republican Government, justice and equality form the basis of the system; and perhaps the structure can rest on no other than the wisdom of man can devise. In a Federal Republic, give me leave to say, it is even more necessary and proper, that a sacred regard should be paid to these considerations. For beyond the sense of the community at large, which has its full agency in such a system, no such Government can act with safety. The Federal ingredient involves local distinctions, which not only produce local jealousies, but give, at the same time, a greater local capacity to support and insist upon equitable demands. In a Confederacy of States, in which the people operate in one respect as citizens, and in another as forming political communities, the local Governments will ever possess a keener sense and capacity, to take advantages of those powers, on which the protection of local rights depend. If these great rights be the basis of republics, and if there be a double necessity of attending to them in a Federal Republic, it is further to be considered, that there is no one right, of which the people can judge with more ease and certainty, and of which they will judge with more jealousy, than of the establishment of the permanent seat of Government; and I am persuaded, that however often this subject may be discussed in the representative body, or however the attention of the committee may be drawn to it, the observations I have made will be more and more verified. We see the operation of this sentiment fully exemplified in what has taken place in the several States. In every instance where the seat of Government has been placed in an unequal position, we have seen the people struggling to place it where it ought to be. In some instances they have not yet succeeded, but I believe they will succeed in all. In many they have actually gained their point.

One of the first measures in the State of Virginia after the commencement of the Revolution, was the removal of the seat of Government from an unequal position, to one which corresponds more with the sense of the State, and an equal regard to the general convenience. In North Carolina we have seen the same principle operating, though in a different mode. In South Carolina the same. In the State of Pennsylvania, powerful as the inducements are in favor of its capital, we have seen serious, and almost successful efforts already to translate it to a proper place. In the State of Delaware, where the Government was as little removed from the centre as it could be in any other State, we have seen the same spirit displaying itself. In the State of

New York, the same thing has happened with some fluctuations, arising from occasional motives of convenience. In Massachusetts, the same effort has been made, and in all probability, when some temporary considerations cease, we shall find the same principle taking effect there also. It is not surprising, when we consider the nature of mankind, that this should be the case.

With respect, however, to the Federal Government, there is one consideration that shows, in a peculiar manner, the necessity and policy of paying a strict attention to this principle. One of the greatest objections which has been made by the opponents of the system, which has been allowed most weight by its friends, is the extent of the United States. It has been asserted by some, and almost feared by others, that within so great a space, no free Government can exist. I hope and trust, that the opinion is erroneous; but, at the same time, I acknowledge it to have a certain degree of force, and it is incumbent on those who wish well to the Union, to diminish this inconvenience as much as possible. The way to diminish it, is to place the Government in that spot which will be least removed from every part of the empire. Carry it to a remote position, and it will be equivalent to an extension of our limits; and if our limits are already extended so far as warrants, in any degree, the apprehension before mentioned, we ought to take care not to extend them further.

The truth is, in every point of view in which we can contemplate this subject, we shall perceive its high importance. It is important that every part of the community should have the power of sending, with equal facility, to the seat of Government such representatives to take care of their interests, as they are disposed to confide in. If you place the Government in an unequal situation, the attendance of the members, and of all others who are to transact the public business, cannot be equally convenient. The members of the Union must be on an unequal footing. Thus you violate the principle of equality, where it ought most carefully to be ascertained, and wound the feelings of the component parts of the community, which can be least injured with impunity. If we consider the expense, that is an inconvenience not without its weight. In the compensations that have been lately voted, the centrality of our position has had a manifest influence. The more remote the Government is, the greater will be the necessity of making liberal compensations, and holding out powerful inducements, in order to obtain the services of fit characters, from every part of the Union; and as you can make no distinction, you must give to those who make the fewest sacrifices the same as to those who make the most.

The seat of Government is of great importance, if you consider the diffusion of wealth that proceeds from this source. I presume that the expenditures which will take place, where the Government will be established by those who are immediately concerned in its administration, and by others who may resort to it, will not be less than half a million dollars a year. It is to be regretted that those who may be most convenient to the centre should enjoy this advantage to a higher degree than others; but the inequality is an evil imposed by necessity; we diminish it as we place the source from which those emanations of wealth are to proceed as near the centre as possible.

If we consider, sir, the effects of Legislative power on the aggregate community, we must feel equal inducements to look for the centre, in order to find the proper seat of Government. Those who are most adjacent to the seat of Legislation will always possess advantages over others. An earlier knowledge of the laws, a greater influence in enacting them, better opportunities for anticipating them, and a thousand other circumstances will give a superiority to those who are thus situated. If it were possible to promulgate our laws, by some instantaneous operation, it would be of less consequence in that point of view where the Government might be placed; but if, on the contrary, time is necessary for this purpose, we ought, as far as possible, to put every part of the community on a level.

If we consider the influence of the Government in its Executive department, there is no less reason to conclude that it ought to be placed in the centre of the Union. It ought to be in a situation to command information relative to every part of the Union, to watch every conjuncture, to seize every circumstance that can be improved. The Executive eye ought to be placed where it can best see the dangers which may threaten, and the Executive arm whence it may be extended most effectually to the protection of every part. Perhaps it is peculiarly necessary, that, in looking for the position we should keep our eye as much as possible towards our Western borders; for a long time dangers will be most apt to assail that quarter of the Union.

In the Judiciary department, if it is not equally necessary, it is highly important that the Government should be equally accessible to all.

Why should the citizens of one quarter of the Union be subject to greater difficulties than others? Why should they be obliged to travel further, to carry their witnesses at a greater expense, and be more subject to all the inconveniences attending the administration of justice at a remote distance? In short, whether we consider the subject with regard to the Executive, the Legislative, or the Judicial departments, we see the soundest reasons for fixing the Government in that place which may be the most permanent centre of territory and population.

With respect to the Western territory, we are not to expect it, for it would be an affront to the understanding of our fellow-citizens on the Western waters, that they will be united with their Atlantic brethren on any other principle than that of equality and justice. He would venture to say that it was essentially necessary, therefore, that we should deal out the blessings of Government with an impartial hand; and that, in placing the Government from which these blessings are to flow, we should retire from the Atlantic as far as is consistent, and approach towards that point which will best accommodate the Western country; in doing this, we shall still stop short of that geographical centre, whose circle would most commodiously embrace our ultramontane fellow-citizens. In his opinion, the desire manifested by them on this subject, was as reasonable as possible; they do not expect that we should lose sight of a proper and easy communication with the Atlantic, and will acquiesce with cheerfulness, in a position necessary for that purpose, though it would still leave them subject to peculiar inconveniences. From the Atlantic to the Mississippi, according to the best computation, the distance is not less than seven hundred and fifty miles; if we go to that part of the Potomac which is proposed, we carry the Government two hundred and fifty miles only west, it will still be five hundred miles from the Mississippi.

He was sure, that if justice required us to take any one position in preference to another, we had every inducement, both of interest and of prudence, to fix on the Potomac, as most satisfactory to our Western brethren. It is impossible to reflect a moment on the possible severance of that branch of the Union without seeing the mischiefs which such an event must create. The area of the United States, divided into two equal parts, will leave, perhaps, one half on the west side of the Alleghany mountains. From the fertility of the soil, the fitness of the climate, and every thing that can favor a growing population, we may suppose the settlement will go on with every degree of rapidity which our imagination can conceive. If the calculation be just, that we double in twenty-five years, we shall speedily behold an astonishing mass of people on the Western waters. Whether this great mass will form a permanent part of the confederacy, or whether it will be separated into an alien, a jealous and a hostile people, may depend on the system of measures that is shortly to be taken. The difference, he observed, between considering them in the light of fellow-citizens, bound to us by a common affection, obeying common laws, pursuing a common good, and considering them in the other light, presents one of the most interesting questions that can occupy an American mind. Instead of peace and friendship, we shall have rivalry and enmity; instead of being a great people, invulnerable on all sides, and without the necessity of those military establishments which other nations require, we shall be driven into the same expensive and dangerous means of defence. We shall be obliged to lay burdens on the people, to support establishments which, sooner or later, may prove fatal to their liberties. It is incumbent on us, if we wish to act the part of magnanimous legislators, or patriotic citizens, to consider well, when we are about to take a step of such vast importance, that it be directed by the views he had described; we must consider what is just, what is equal, and what is satisfactory.

It may be asked, why it was necessary to urge these principles, since they would not be denied? He apprehended, that, in general, there would be a disagreement as to the principles which ought to govern. But, at the same time, principles were so connected with facts, in the present case, that it was not more necessary to collect all the light than to fortify all the impressions that might be favorable to a just decision.

On a candid view of the two rivers, he flattered himself that the seat which would most correspond with the public interest would be found on the banks of the Potomac. It was proper that we should have some regard to the centre of territory; if that was to have weight, he begged leave to say, that there was no comparison between the two rivers. He defied any gentleman to cast his eye in the most cursory manner over a map and say that the Potomac is not much nearer this centre than any part of the Susquehanna. If we measure from the banks of the Potomac to the most eastern parts of the United States, it is less distant than to diagonally, the Potomac will have the advantage. If you draw a line perpendicularly to the direction of the Atlantic coast, we shall find that it will run more equally through the Potomac than through any part of the Union; or, if there be any difference between one side and the other, there will be a greater space on the southwest than on the northeast. All the maps of the United States show the truth of this. From the Atlantic coast to that line which separates the British possessions from the United States, the average distance is not more than one hundred and fifty miles. If you take the average breadth of the other great division of the United States, it will be found to be six, seven, and eight hundred miles.

From this view of the subject, which is not easy to describe by words, but which will strike every eye that looks on a map, I am sure that if the Potomac is not the geographical centre it is because the Susquehanna is less so.

He acknowledged that regard was also to be paid to the centre of population. But where shall we find this centre? He knew of no rule by which to be governed, except the proportion among the representatives of the different States; and he believed, if that criterion was taken, the present centre of population would be found somewhere in Pennsylvania, and not far from the Susquehanna. He granted that the present centre of population is nearer the Susquehanna than the Potomac. But are we choosing a seat of Government for the present moment only? He presumed not; we must look forward to those probable changes that may soon take place. He appealed to the judgment of every gentleman, if they had not reason to suppose that these future changes in the population of this country would be particularly favorable to that part which lies south of the Potomac. On what do the measures and extent of population depend? They depend on the climate, on the soil, and the vacancy to be filled. We find that population, like money, seeks those places where it least abounds, and has always the same tendency to equalize itself. We see the people moving from the more crowded to the less crowded parts. The swarm does not come from the southern, but from the northern and eastern hives. This will continue to be the case, until every part of America receives its due share of population. If there be any event on which we may calculate with certainty, I take it that the centre of population will continually advance in a south-western direction. It must then travel from the Susquehanna; if it is now found there, it may even extend beyond the Potomac. But the time would be long first, and as the Potomac is the great highway of communication between the Atlantic and the western country, attempts to remove the seat further south must be improbable. I have said that the communication with the Western Territory is more commodious through the Potomac than through the Susquehanna; I wish all the facts connected with this subject could have been more fully ascertained, and more fully stated; but if we consider the facts that have been offered by gentlemen who have spoken on the subject, we must conclude that the communication through the Potomac would be more facile and effectual than through any other channel. If we consider what was related by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Scott,) whose judgment is the more to be relied on, as it is founded on his own personal knowledge of that country—he tells you, that the communication by water, either to or from the western country is next to impracticable by the Susquehanna.

Mr. CLYMER begged to set the gentleman right; his colleague, if he understood him, had only related the communication by the northwestern branches, but there was a communication by the Juniata, a branch of the Susquehanna, about fifteen miles above Harrisburg, tending westerly, and navigable eighty miles, from whence to the Conemagh was a portage, with a road actually laid out of about forty miles, hence you descend the Kiskaminetaz to the Allegany, and from thence to Pittsburgh is thirty miles.

Mr. SCOTT knew this communication pretty well, but we who live in that country never take it into consideration, as the waters are too small to afford a certainty of communication, but even here the portage was greater than between the Potomac and Youghogony.

Mr. CLYMER said, with respect to the navigation of the Juniata, that it was in evidence before the House of Assembly of Pennsylvania, when they were considering the means of uniting that navigation with the western waters, that produce to the amount of fourteen hundred bushels had been brought down it to Middletown.

Mr. MANISON proceeded and said, he wished every fact to be ascertained that could throw any light upon the subject. Taking the Susquehanna, as it was practicable for navigation, it would be found, that through that route of communication, Fort Pitt would be four or five hundred miles from the proposed seat on its banks, and that the distance by land was not less than two hundred and fifty miles; whereas, through the Potomac, the distance from the proposed spot on its banks to Fort Pitt was not calculated at more than two hundred and fifty miles, and he believed the distance by land would be found not to exceed one hundred and sixty to one hundred and seventy miles.

Whether we measure the distance by land or water, then, the result is in favor of the Potomac. If we consider the progress already made in opening this great channel its title becomes still stronger. Let me add, that it has been found, on accurate research, that the waters communicating with the Ohio are not more than two or three miles distant from the sources of the Potomac. This is a fact of peculiar importance.

It has been said, that if Congress shall make choice of the Potomac, greater discontents would arise than if they should prefer the Susquehanna. I know not the data from which this opinion is drawn. Who will have the greatest right to complain? Will it be those who might be gratified if the Government should be fixed on the Susquehanna? I believe not. The truth is, that if the place which is now short of the geographical centre be short also of the centre of population, as it will be in a reasonable time, we have reason to conclude that the southern inhabitants will feel themselves most aggrieved. I do not hesitate to declare, that if the seat of Government should be fixed on the Susquehanna, every part south of that river, and every part of the United States south of the Ohio, will conceive that the great principles of equal justice have been disregarded. If we are to consider the subject, in that point of view, I am certain it is most expedient that we should give the preference to the Potomac. This is not all; if you establish the Government on the Potomac, those who think themselves not equally dealt by, will find the cause of their discontent continually subsiding, because the centre of population will be continually approaching the geographical centre. If, on the other hand, you fix the seat in a place which is perpetually uncentral with respect to territory, the centre of population will continually recede, and the cause of discontent continually increase.

The gentleman from Massachusetts yesterday raised great objections against the Potomac, because it was, as he supposed, subject to periodical maladies, from which the other river was free. I am not authorized, from personal experience, or very particular information, to draw a comparison between them; but there are some general facts that may serve to show, that if there is any difference it is more likely to be in favor of the Potomac than of the Susquehanna. The position contemplated on the banks of the former is considerably further from tide water than the place proposed on the latter. On this account, therefore, we have little reason to suppose that the Potomac is more unhealthy. If we regard their comparative situations, westwardly, the spot on the Potomac is almost as much further to the west, as it is distant from the proposed spot on the Susquehanna; and he well knew that, generally speaking, as we retire towards the western and upper country, we are generally removed from the causes of those diseases to which southern situations are exposed. As the two places are moreover in the same latitude, the objection advanced, with respect to that point, cannot apply to one more than the other. It is only their western or eastern position, their remoteness from, or their proximity to the lower country, and to fresh or stagnant waters, that can possibly affect the question. It is not because we advance so much to the south that we advance to the centre, it is because we go more to the west. I do not know that there is a difference of more than a degree and five or six minutes between the latitude of New York and the place proposed on the Potomac.

I will not at present go further into this argument. I flatter myself that the considerations already stated will have their proper weight; and if they should be controverted, that we shall be able further to support and inculcate them.

Mr. ANES never intended that this question should be carried through the committee by the strength of a silent majority; he had confidence in the weight of the arguments to be urged in favor of the Susquehanna, and he was willing to put the decision of the question on that ground. He would now come forward, and give the reasons of his opinion, especially as gentlemen had entered fully into the reasons which guided their own to a different conclusion. He did not conceive it would be necessary for him, coming from the part of the United States from which he did, to disclaim the local views and narrow prejudices with which the subject teemed. He had feared, when the question was first brought forward, that the minds of gentlemen would be highly fermented, indeed so much, that he almost despaired of coming to a proper decision, nor did he think these apprehensions were illusive, if he judged from what had already taken place. He had observed that some gentlemen, whose discernments were clear and who were generally guided by the straight line of rectitude, had been most surprisingly warped on the present occasion; he was fearful that their wishes had misled them from a due regard of the real object of their pursuit, viz. the public interest and convenience. He was sensible, that he himself was liable to some improper impressions; but he trusted he did not feel them in that degree which he thought he saw in others. He was willing to be led by the great principles which other gentlemen had laid down as the rule of their decision; but he thought they would lead to a different conclusion from what had been drawn from them; he admitted that a central situation is to be taken, and in considering this centre, the centre of a sea-coast line ought to be regarded, because it is more conveniently accessible, has more wealth, and more people than an equal area of inland country. Being more liable to invasion, Government should be near to protect it. It is the interest of the back country to have the Government near the sea, to inspect and encourage trade, by which their abundant produce will find an export. And lastly, he said the contingency of the separation of the Western country was a reason for preferring the sea-coast. He proceeded next to say, there will not be any contest where this centre of the sea-coast line is to be found; it falls between the rivers Potomac and Susquehanna. It will be found that there are good reasons why we should rather move East than South.

If the sea-coast line is to be preferred it will follow that the back lands, west of the Ohio, which the gentleman from Virginia has so often taken into his calculations, will be excluded; they are not peopled; they do not affect the sea-coast line; and that line has already been voted to be the proper one by the committee. As it is true that the sea-coast has more wealth and more people than the inland country in proportion to the extent, it is equally true that the Eastern half of the sea-coast has more of both than the Southern. If we reckon Maryland, which will be as well accommodated by the Susquehanna as by the Potomac, we shall find the population of the Eastern part nearly two millions, and the population of free inhabitants still less in favor of the latter.

But, sir, instead of seeking a centre geographically, we should consider the centre of common convenience. The place is the proper one where the greatest number of persons will be best accommodated. I will endeavor to show that that will be on the Susquehanna. Is the zeal of gentlemen, who oppose this design, influenced by their despair of removing the seat of Government afterwards? I believe the people of America will not complain of it. If fixed there, I think it will be found convenient and will remain there.

The Susquehanna is the centre of the common convenience. At this moment there is more wealth and more inhabitants East than South of it. But the future population of America is calculated, and it is pretended that the balance of population is receding from the East. Surely the present inhabitants may be allowed principally to consult their own convenience. West of the Ohio is an almost unmeasurable wilderness; when it will be settled, or how it will be possible to govern it, is past calculation. Gentlemen will pardon me if I think it perfectly romantic to make this decision depend upon that circumstance. Probably it will be near a century before those people will be considerable; if we fix the national seat in the proper place now, it would give me no inquietude to know that a hundred years hence it may be liable to be removed; but, in fact, the principle that is assumed by the committee, and which I have attempted to justify, of taking the centre of the sea-coast line, will even in the event of that vast tract being settled, furnish abundant reasons for its remaining on the Susquehanna. I will not recapitulate those reasons. We must take some principles to guide us; and though some inequalities will appear, yet let gentlemen remember that, in so vast a country, great inconvenience will attend the communications of the people with Government, be the seat of it where it may; and by taking the centre of the sea-coast line there will be less than any other principle. It will be found best to accommodate the greatest number; of, in other words, to be the centre of common convenience; indeed, this is not denied to be true at this moment; but the case is said to be changing. On the one hand, I think it is Utopian to calculate upon the population of the United States a century hence; and, on the other hand, I admit that it is impolitic at least, perhaps unjust, to confine our attention to the present population; a quarter of a century may be a medium. Will gentlemen deny that trade and manufactures will accumulate people in the Eastern States, in proportion of five to three, compared with the Southern? The disproportion will, doubtless, continue to be much greater than I have calculated. It is actually greater at present; for the climate and negro slavery are acknowledged to be unfavorable to population; so that husbandry, as well as commerce and manufactures, will give more people in the Eastern than in the Southern States. The very circumstance that gentlemen found their reasonings upon is pretty strongly against their calculations. They tell us of the vast quantities of good land still unsettled in their States; that will produce a thin population; for the old lands will not be crowded so long as new ones are to be had.

So far, therefore, as we may be allowed to look forward, the eastern half, from this central seat, will be far more populous than the other. In New England the settled parts are said to contain about forty-five to a square mile.

Much is said of the separation of the Western country. At a remote period the junction of the British colonies with the Union might be taken into view.

The seat of Government on the Susquehanna will be nearly accessible by water to all the people on the sea-coast by the Delaware river on the one side, and Chesapeake bay on the other.

Let us next consider the inland navigation of this river. Pittsburgh, on the Ohio, may be considered as the key of those waters, at least to the northward; it is a kind of common centre. Let us see how we shall approach it by the Susquehanna.

From Havre de Grace, at the mouth of Susquehanna, and at the head of the Chesapeake to Wright's Ferry, is (and here the Federal town probably will be)

Mr. Madison thought the gentleman mistaken in his calculations.

Mr. CARROLL begged leave to give the committee some information respecting the distance from tide-water to Fort Cumberland; from the tide-water to the Little Falls was three miles, to the Great Falls six more, and from thence to the Old Town one hundred and seventeen; which last place was fifteen miles from Fort Cumberland, making in all one hundred and forty-five miles, instead of two hundred, as stated by the gentleman.

Mr. AMES imagined his statement to be nearly right, and he found Mr. JEFFERSON stated in his Notes that the Falls of the Potomac were fifteen miles in extent, and a navigation extremely difficult to be made.

Mr. CARROLL said, it was not near that distance; in the fifteen miles there were three falls, the Seneca, the Great and Little Falls, but they occupy but a small part of the fifteen miles; he could certainly form some judgment of a place which he might say was almost at his door, and did not expect that Mr. Jefferson's Notes would have been adduced as an authority to contradict information he had given in his place. As to the difficulty of the navigation he had to observe that many of the obstacles were already so far removed as to render the transportation down to the Great Falls practicable; that there the canal was nearly finished, and ready to sink the lock-seats and insert the frames, so that in a little time there was a probability that no impediment whatever would obstruct the descent of produce to the tide-water.

Mr. AMES then proceeded with his calculation; and, said he, let us compare this route to Pittsburg, with that by the Potomac.

	Miles.

I have reason to confide in these calculations. The latter is said to be made by a distinguished person, whose authority no man will dispute. If it is true, or any thing near true, it will destroy the whole argument in favor of the Potomac. I have consulted the best informed persons out of the House, and believe the statement to be true, as it respects both rivers. If it is, the ponderous edifice which the gentleman from Virginia has erected with so much labor crumbles to powder. For it will appear, that it is more than 70 miles nearer by the Susquehanna and Juniata to Pittsburg, than by way of the Potomac. Neither should we forget, from the tide water on the Potomac to Chesapeake is near 200 miles. Of course the access by water is less convenient and direct. The eastern branch of the Susquehanna is navigable to the head of Lake Otego. A detachment of General Sullivan's troops came in boats from the lake quite down the river. This river stretches its long arms, and embraces a vast country, comprehending not less than twenty millions of acres.

Let us next consider the connexion through this water with the lakes. Its branches approach the Alleghany river very near, and by a portage of only three miles, communicate with the waters of Lake Erie.

Reckoning from Fort Pitt, Lake Erie, and its waters, and the several branches of the Susquehanna, it will be found that more than fifty thousand square miles are accommodated with water carriage. Perhaps, out of America, there is not another such an instance in the world. Yet this is not all. The water communication by the Potomac is subservient to the argument for the Susquehanna; for if the western country is so wonderfully accommodated by it as a highway, then it is only sixty miles travel, a mere portage, to Wright's Ferry; they will be on a footing with those who came by sea, and they will have still greater advantages over many of those who travel by land.

However, Mr. Jefferson's account of the Potomac does not correspond with the praises now bestowed upon it. He says, the falls are fifteen miles long, and speaks very unfavorably of the inferior navigation. In Summer, the waters are very subject to fail. My informants prefer the waters of the Susquehanna. Admitting, however, that the Potomac is as commodious as the other, still there are weighty reasons in favor of its rival.

The advantage to the neighboring country, in point of trade, resulting from the Federal town, is unessential in a national view. The people on the Potomac will not be injured, in the conveyance, or sales of their produce, by having it fixed on the Susquehanna. For the influence of the Federal town, in this respect, will not extend far. And as to the convenient access to the Government, it will make only sixty miles difference, which surely is not an object. But the great national point is, to fix the seat of Government in that place where it will best secure the Union.

The Potomac is, in some degree, exposed to two dangers; by sea, and from the mountains. Large vessels can go to Georgetown. The events of the late war have proved that there is a foundation for this apprehension. The Western country is to be viewed under different circumstances. From Lake Erie, by Pittsburgh, to the head of the Chesapeake, the people are naturally connected with us, they must send their produce through the States. But lower down the Ohio and the Mississippi the people have their exports by the latter will not be willing to leave the Southern States in the Union. The separation will not take place by the mountains, which are far from being impassable. The capital, if imprudently placed so far southwest, will furnish a temptation for this division, and strength and resources to maintain it. I will not debate on this idea, though I think it an important one. The more it is weighed, the more hazardous and preposterous it will appear to place the Capital in a situation where gentlemen's own arguments admit, when they speak of the contingency of losing the Western country, that we may need all our strength, and yet where we should be able to command but a small part of it. Contrast this with the Susquehanna. The country is perfectly safe from the dangers of invasion by sea and from the mountains. If a division should happen, the seat of Government will fall on the right side of the dividing line; and so much strength on the frontier of that line will prevent a division. For the country from Lake Erie to Fort Pitt, and from thence to Lake Champlain, vast in its extent, its soil is fruitful, its climate favorable to the production of a hardy race of men, and to sustain a vast multitude of them. This extensive country will be benefited, in some degree, and in a greater attached to the Union, by fixing the seat of Government in this place; besides, nature has united them by indissoluble ties. It is a pleasing reflection to trace the effect of the strength of this part of the Western Territory, towards securing the remaining Western region of the Union. At all events, the country east of a line, drawn from Lake Erie to the Chesapeake, will be safe from the force of any other part of America; will that other part be safe from this Eastern part? Though national justice, and the wisest policy, should direct our councils, yet ambitious men will find a motive and a pretext for fomenting a division. But those near the line of the Eastern half will be unwilling to be a frontier; those farther south will be equally so; and what barrier, in case of a separation, have they to oppose to their Northern neighbors? The mountains furnish none, and both parties live beyond them. The great rivers will expose them to hostile inroads, as they will afford a convenient passage to troops. In fact, the Western people will secure the Western people. If the separation should notwithstanding take place, it would not be because nature directs it. We should have the consolation of reflecting, that we have provided the best means of preventing its happening at all, and from it, after it has happened, the best security against the effects which may result.

I will not pretend to say, that any one of these arguments is conclusive; nor do I flatter myself that they will immediately produce conviction; I place dependence on the moderation and good sense of gentlemen who possess public spirit and private honor; I rely upon the calm review which they will make of my observations a week hence, when the fervor of this debate has subsided.

I appeal to their candor, at that time, to decide, whether, in point of centrality, accessibility, protection to the Union, salubrity, and safety from insurrection and invasion, there is not solid reason for establishing the seat of Government on the Susquehanna. I will not say that the Potomac is insalubrious; but it is well known that Northern constitutions are impaired by moving to a more Southern latitude. The air may be healthful, but the change is found to be pernicious to them. Whether there is any foundation for it or not, the Eastern people would dread the experiment.

The preservation of the Union is the worthiest object of a patriot's wishes. The world has doubted our success. I feel a consolation in the opinion, that the measure I am contending for will best contribute to that end. An American Legislature may seek true glory by such measures as will tend to secure the Union, to preserve peace, and to diffuse the blessings of science, liberty, and good government, over a greater extent of country, and in a higher degree than the world ever enjoyed them. Surely, this will interest the pride of every honest heart. It is the philosophy of ambition, or it is the religion of politics.

The question on Mr. Lee's motion for striking out Susquehanna, and inserting Potomac, was put and lost; for it, 21, against it, 29.

Mr. Madison then moved, to add, after "Susquehanna" the words "or Potomac;" this would furnish an opportunity to examine and compare the two situations. It was so favorable to a discovery of the truth, that he did not doubt but gentlemen who were desirous of grounding their decision upon a full understanding of the subject would agree to the motion.

Mr. Boudinot seconded this motion, and supported it by observing the necessity there appeared to be, of obtaining a more accurate knowledge of the two rivers, as gentlemen seemed to differ materially with respect to the matter of fact.

Mr. SHERMAN contended, upon the principles adopted yesterday by the committee, that they could not think of going to the Potomac; he said, that taking the population, even allowing the slaves in the Southern States, there was the great weight of population Northeast of the Susquehanna; but upon the ratio of representation, at a member for forty thousand inhabitants, there was but one million two hundred thousand south of Pennsylvania; one million four hundred thousand north, including Pennsylvania; but if the calculation was made from the Potomac, the South would contain nine hundred and sixty thousand inhabitants, and the North one million six hundred and eighty thousand. Now, he would ask, if gentlemen could expect that the Northern people would incline to go so far south? He apprehended they would not.

Mr. CLYMER had mentioned the navigation of the Juniata; but not confiding altogether upon his own memory, he had applied to a very well informed and respectable authority, the Governor of the Western Territory, for information, and he learned that his former opinion was confirmed, and that five hundred bushels of produce had been transported in one boat from Frankstown, at the head of the Juniata, to Middletown.

Mr. MADISON said, the circumstances of being obliged to resort to such an accidental piece of information as the gentleman had just mentioned, strongly evinced, to his mind, the defective knowledge which the committee had at this time of what ought to have considerable influence on the determination of the present question. The object of this motion was to attain more accurate information.

The question being taken on inserting "or Potomac," it passed in the negative.

On motion of Mr. PAGE, the committee rose and reported progress, and then the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, September 5.

A memorial from the Marquis de Chartier de Lotbiniere, was presented to the House, and read, stating his claim to two manors, and seignories, situated at the head of Lake Champlain, and bordering on the east bank of the head of the said lake; to the possession of which, the United States have succeeded by virtue of the late Treaty of Peace with Great Britain, and praying that he may receive an equivalent for the same, and a just compensation for the time he has been deprived of the possession thereof.

PERMANENT SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on establishing the permanent residence of Congress; when,

Mr. FITZSIMONS presented the following resolution:

Resolved, As the opinion of this committee, that the President of the United States be authorized to appoint commissioners, to examine, and report to him, the most eligible situation on the east bank of the Susquehanna, for the permanent seat of Government of the United States. That the said commissioners be authorized, by and with the advice of the President to purchase such quantity of lands as may be thought necessary, and to erect thereon, within ——— years, suitable buildings for the accommodation of Congress, and of the officers of the United States. That the Secretary of the Treasury, together with the commissioners so to be appointed, be authorized to borrow a sum not exceeding ——— dollars, to be paid in ——— years, with interest, at the rate of ——— per cent. per annum, payable out of the duties on import and tonnage, to be applied to the purchase of the land, and the erection of the buildings aforesaid. And that a bill ought to pass, in the present session, in conformity with the foregoing resolution.

Mr. SMITH (of South Carolina) doubted the propriety of the resolution, because he conceived the declaration in the Constitution required a cession of territory as well as jurisdiction. If he was joined in this sentiment by the committee, he would move that the President be empowered to appoint commissioners to examine and report a proper place on the banks of the Susquehanna for a federal town, and that, whenever the State of Pennsylvania shall cede to the United States a certain district or territory, not exceeding ten miles square, Congress would accept thereof for the above purpose.

Mr. SUMNER inquired, whether the State of Pennsylvania had not already made a cession.

Mr. HARTLEY replied, that the State of Pennsylvania had, by its convention, made a cession as required by the Constitution of the United States, to Congress, of the jurisdiction over any district, not exceeding ten miles square, that may be chosen by the acceptance of Congress, for the seat of Government of the United States. He could not help expressing some degree of surprise that gentlemen should advocate such an unreasonable proposition as that a State should convey to the United States the fee simple in a soil which, in all probability, was the property of individuals, and would require the exercise of a despotic power to wrest from them for that purpose.

Mr. SUMNER said, the committee could take no notice of what was done by the convention; he wished to know if the Legislature had conveyed such a right to Congress.

Mr. HARTLEY said, there had been some doubts with respect to the power of the Legislature to divide its jurisdiction with another; but the convention, who were chosen for the purpose of ratifying the Constitution, had adequate powers, and had made a cession in the manner he before mentioned.

Mr. SUMNER apprehended it was necessary the cession should be made by the Legislature, because it was to be done by the State, and in the subsequent part of the clause it substitutes the word Legislature; from whence it may be fairly inferred, that the action is to be performed by the Legislature of the State, and not by the convention.

Mr. CLYMER said, it was specially referred to the convention, by the State of Pennsylvania, to make the cession of territory alluded to in the Constitution; so, if the gentlemen would be satisfied, they had made a double cession; namely, a cession by both the convention and the Legislature.

Mr. SMITH (of South Carolina) inquired whether the cession extended to both soil and jurisdiction?

Mr. FITZSIMONS would answer the question by asking the gentleman whether there was any thing in the Constitution that looked like a requisition of soil?

Mr. AMES said, the opposition was more ingenious than solid, and hoped it was not intended to embarrass the business. If, however, the State of Pennsylvania had not granted the jurisdiction, it did not follow, that Congress could not fix the permanent seat of Government within its limits.

Mr. SMITH (of South Carolina) grounded his objection on principle, and he was not unsupported, for the cession of Delaware countenanced the idea he contended for. He supposed a State might find its interest in purchasing such a tract and presenting it to Congress, at the same time it would defray to the United States all the expense of establishing a permanent residence. In the present low state of the federal treasury, this was an object of considerable importance, and if it would be attained by taking as central a situation as that proposed in Pennsylvania, it was an argument of considerable weight in accepting it.

Mr. LAWRENCE would inquire for what purpose the cession, mentioned in the Constitution, was required? It was, in the words of that instrument, to exercise exclusive Legislation in all cases whatsoever; now, did this consequence involve in it a territorial possession? It certainly did not. It involved nothing more than the power of making laws, independent of the State jurisdiction. The gentleman might have carried his idea further, for as the cession is to be made by particular States, it seems to infer that two States, at least, should be concerned in the cession; but would objections, from such forced constructions, have any weight in the judgment of the committee? He trusted they would not. He supposed it more rational to attend to the plain literal meaning of the Constitution than to engage in the discussion of the refined speculations of ingenious men.

Mr. Vining observed that Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia, had offered to cede territory, as well as jurisdiction, and there would be a great impriety in spending the Federal treasure, in purchasing the soil, when they might have it without expense.

Mr. AMES endeavored to show that such a cession, as was contemplated in the Constitution, might be made by one State to another, without giving a property to a foot of land. By comparing it with the cession of Silesia to Prussia, where not a single acre of soil was conveyed, but of jurisdiction to the whole province; so, when territory changes its government, by being the sacrifice of a treaty of peace.

He supposed that Congress were to purchase the soil necessary to erect buildings for the accommodation of the Government, and was satisfied the cession might be made subsequent to their election of a particular spot.

Mr. JACKSON opposed the purchase of soil at this time, because the existing demands on the public were of a primary nature, and ought not to be set aside for the attainment of an object which might be very well suspended for a considerable time.

Mr. STONE did not object to the purchase of the soil, because, with judicious management, the Government might dispose of it again at a profit; and not only indemnify the expense of the purchase, but raise enough to defray the price of erecting necessary buildings.

Mr. Vining said it was not his intention that the State Government should take the property of individuals without compensation; but he could easily conceive that it would be worth while for the State to purchase a tract of country, and give it to the General Government for their permanent residence. If it was to cost one hundred thousand dollars, and the State would receive an advantage equal to two hundred thousand dollars, from having the emporium of America in their neighborhood, he conceived it would be a good bargain.

Mr. SENEY.—The gentleman from Delaware has said that Maryland proposed a cession of soil; but I believe, sir, there is not such a word as soil mentioned in the law.

Mr. CARROLL agreed with his colleague, and supposed that a cession of soil could not have been contemplated, because the State of Maryland had offered any part of the State, not excepting the town of Baltimore. He believed if Congress were disposed to fix in that town, it would be agreeable to the State; but he did not imagine they would agree to give the General Government a property to the whole town, and the surrounding country. The other parts of the State had never contemplated making the inhabitants of Baltimore a compensation for such an immense property.

Mr. GOUGHEN believed, if the House had agreed to go to the Potomac, there would have been none of these Constitutional difficulties stated. It was well known, he said, that the gentlemen from the Eastward had no desire to take up the subject; but those from the Southward were sanguine in their expectations that they should get the Government to the Potomac; and were, therefore, for pressing the business, and not allowing it to be postponed, as was contended for on the other hand.

Mr. MADISON said the business was not brought on by their original notion, though they gave it their support. It was true, that a proposition for postponement was made, but what was the extent of that postponement? Till December or January next. Was there any reason to suppose that those gentlemen, who were, at this day, opposed to the Potomac, would give into such a change of opinion by that time as to induce us to agree to their proposition? We saw no reason to expect such a change. And, as in fact we find a predetermined majority ready to dispose of us, the sooner we know our destiny the better; for it can be of little consequence, if we are to be disposed of, whether we are disposed of in September or December.

Mr. WADSWORTH.—The reiteration of being disposed of, by bargaining, induces me to rise and make one remark. It is a notorious fact, to the members within these walls, that the New England members, to a man, were opposed to a decision at present; and that they were disposed to accommodate the Southern States. They refused all bargaining, till they were assured there was a bargaining set on foot to carry them to the Potomac. Why, then, are we reproached with this? Whatever bargaining there has been, we were the last to come into it; we never thought of it, till we were told that we were a property, and should be disposed of, unless we took care of ourselves. I hope, as we have gone so far, we shall settle the subject in dispute by granting the money and erecting the necessary buildings.

Mr. JACKSON denied being concerned in any bargaining whatever, and defied any gentleman to say he knew any thing of one, till he heard it mentioned on this floor; he was determined to keep himself disengaged, and to vote according as his judgment should lead him, after hearing the subject coolly and thoroughly discussed.

Mr. MADISON hoped, if he travelled a little out of order, he should be justified, after what had taken place; but he could not withhold this public declaration of his wish, that every thing that had passed on the subject alluded to by the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. WADSWORTH,) were to be fully understood, and were reduced to writing. Every thing he knew of it he was willing, on his part, to put into that form; and he was well persuaded that it would be found, on examination, that the opposition of the Southern gentlemen was of a defensive nature, and that they had not listened to a proposition, until they had reason to think it necessary to prevent a sudden and improper decision of this very important question.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, begged gentlemen to remember, that all the Southern members had not been in favor of bringing forward the business at the present session; he had opposed it as well as some others.

Mr. TUCKER wished, before the blanks in the resolution were filled up, that it might be amended, for in its present form he conceived it to be totally inadmissible. The objections already mentioned, struck his mind with great force; but he had one further objection. We are proceeding, said he, by this resolution, to give a discretionary power to the President of the United States, and the commissioners he may appoint, which no body of men ought to exercise but ourselves with the other branch of the Legislature. We fix a line, on some part of which the commissioners are authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the President, to purchase such quantity of land as they think proper. There is a power to fix the seat of Government on any part of a line five or six hundred miles in extent. Were we sent here to give such powers to any men? It is nothing less, in my mind, than betraying those rights of our fellow-citizens which we were sent here to guard. The place where the permanent seat of Government shall be fixed is allowed, by every member, to be a matter of great consequence to every part of the Union; the warmth of the debates evinces it to be a matter of the first importance, yet we are willing to get rid of it in any way, and throw it into such hands as our constituents never expected. I have no want of confidence in the judgment and discretion of the President, or those whom he may employ; but I never can agree that they shall exercise their judgment or discretion in a business to which the two branches of the Legislature alone are competent. We ought ourselves to fix the particular spot, and not leave it to any one, however eminent his station, to say where we shall assemble to legislate; there may be danger in the precedent. But are all the parts of this long river alike eligible? If they are not, it is another reason why we should decide upon the spot. I would, move, therefore, to alter the resolution, by making it the duty of the commissioners to report to Congress, and not to the President; by which means, at a future session, we shall be able to execute the whole plan according to our judgment.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, begged gentlemen to remember, that all the Southern members had not been in favor of bringing forward the business at the present session; he had opposed it as well as some others.

Mr. TUCKER wished, before the blanks in the resolution were filled up, that it might be amended, for in its present form he conceived it to be totally inadmissible. The objections already mentioned, struck his mind with great force; but he had one further objection. We are proceeding, said he, by this resolution, to give a discretionary power to the President of the United States, and the commissioners he may appoint, which no body of men ought to exercise but ourselves with the other branch of the Legislature. We fix a line, on some part of which the commissioners are authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the President, to purchase such quantity of land as they think proper. There is a power to fix the seat of Government on any part of a line five or six hundred miles in extent. Were we sent here to give such powers to any men? It is nothing less, in my mind, than betraying those rights of our fellow-citizens which we were sent here to guard. The place where the permanent seat of Government shall be fixed is allowed, by every member, to be a matter of great consequence to every part of the Union; the warmth of the debates evinces it to be a matter of the first importance, yet we are willing to get rid of it in any way, and throw it into such hands as our constituents never expected. I have no want of confidence in the judgment and discretion of the President, or those whom he may employ; but I never can agree that they shall exercise their judgment or discretion in a business to which the two branches of the Legislature alone are competent. We ought ourselves to fix the particular spot, and not leave it to any one, however eminent his station, to say where we shall assemble to legislate; there may be danger in the precedent. But are all the parts of this long river alike eligible? If they are not, it is another reason why we should decide upon the spot. I would, move, therefore, to alter the resolution, by making it the duty of the commissioners to report to Congress, and not to the President; by which means, at a future session, we shall be able to execute the whole plan according to our judgment.

After this was done, he would proceed and make the best bargain he could with a State for the soil. He did not know that his colleague was right in supposing that the Constitution required a cession of territory, as well as jurisdiction; but he thought, if it could be obtained, it would be of great advantage to the Union, and he was willing to accept it.

Mr. SUMTER approved of the idea of his colleague, and would second his motion if he would go further; he wished the commissioners to go and explore the banks of the river, and report a choice of situations, by which means one would be bidding against another, and the Government, perhaps, might get the soil at a moderate price.

The question was put, on striking out the word "him" after "report to," and insert "Congress;" this passed in the negative, twenty-one for, and twenty-nine against it.

It was then agreed to fill the first blank with three. It was severally moved to fill the second blank with four, three, two, and one year; but all these being negatived, the blank was left to be filled in the House.

The third blank, respecting the sum to defray the expense, was filled with one hundred thousand dollars, to be paid in twenty years, at an interest of five per cent.

The whole resolution was then agreed to, twenty-nine to nineteen; after which the committee rose, and reported the resolution; which being under consideration in the House,

Mr. LEE conceived it to be his duty to present once more the preamble, which had been rejected in committee. He flattered himself, after the discussion which had taken place, that gentlemen were prepared to decide on liberal and national principles, and, therefore, they would adopt those he presented.

Mr. CARROLL would not have undertaken to trouble the House with his sentiments again, but that the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. AMES) insisted much upon the facts he found stated in Mr. Jefferson's Notes on Virginia. After he had undertaken to assure the Committee of the Whole of the facts respecting the navigation of the Potomac, which he could, as it were, observe from his own door, he expected, from that gentleman's candor, when he informed him that the falls were not extended the length of fifteen miles, and that the obstacles to the navigation were, in a great measure, removed, that he would not have dwelt upon them as arguments against going to the Potomac. He mentioned, that such progress was made in facilitating the navigation through the falls, that there was every probability an unimpeded passage would be allowed to the produce of the lands on its most remote and western branches; since which he had learned that a vessel, carrying twenty-four hogheads of tobacco, equal to twelve tons burden, had come down that river to within thirteen miles of Georgetown, by which it was evident that the greatest obstructions were removed. From a knowledge of these facts, he hoped the gentleman's candor would induce him to give up the conclusions he drew from different information; and he trusted his justice would engage him to give a different vote from what he had given in the committee.

Mr. SENEY approved of the Susquehanna in preference to the Potomac, on every principle which had been brought into view, as proper to guide the House in deciding the present question. He treated the alarm which gentlemen apprehended would be given by fixing on the Susquehanna as merely ideal, and existing nowhere but in the imagination of gentlemen; so far from exciting jealousy, or disturbing the public mind, he contemplated it as tending to allay uneasiness, and to give general satisfaction.

On motion, the House now adjourned.

MONDAY, September 7.

PERMANENT SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported by the Committee of the Whole for establishing the permanent residence of Congress.

Whereupon, the first resolution was agreed to, and the second, to wit:

Resolved, That the permanent seat of the Government of the United States ought to be at some convenient place on the east bank of the river Susquehanna, in the State of Pennsylvania; and that, until the necessary buildings be erected for the purpose, the seat of Government ought to continue at the city of New York.

being under consideration,

Mr. LEE withdrew his proposition offered yesterday, and moved to amend the said resolution, by striking out the words "East bank of the river Susquehanna, in the State of Pennsylvania," and inserting in lieu thereof, the "North bank of the river Potomac, in the State of Maryland."

And, on the question that the House do agree to the said amendment, the yeas and nays were demanded, and are

YEAS—Messrs. Baldwin, Bland, Brown, Burke, Carroll, Coles, Contee, Galt, Griffin, Gilman, Goodhue, Hartley, Hathorn, Lawrence, Livermore, P. Muhlenberg, Partridge, Van Rensselaer, Scott, Seney, Sherman, Sylvester, Sinnerickson, Smith, (of Maryland,) Thatcher, Trumbull, Wadsworth and Wynkoop—29.

NAYES—Messrs. Benson, Boudinot, Cadwalader, Clymer, Fitzsimons, Floyd, Foster, Gerry, Gilman, Goodhue, Grout, Hartley, Hathorn, Heister, Lawrence, Livermore, P. Muhlenberg, Partridge, Van Rensselaer, Scott, Seney, Sherman, Sylvester, Sinnerickson, Smith, (of Maryland,) Thatcher, Trumbull, Wadsworth and Wynkoop—29.

So it was determined in the negative.

Mr. Vining said, it now became his duty, after having sacrificed a prejudice, if he had one, by giving his vote for the Potomac, to bring before the House the humble claim of Delaware. He apprehended that her claim to centrality, as it respected wealth and population, were superior to that of the Susquehanna; and that, if a sea-coast line was to be a criterion, she was near the centre of territory. He supposed that this was the line upon which the Committee was to decide for the present. It was not supposed necessary, at this time, to take into consideration the vacant and extensive Western Territory, or why refuse the Potomac, which offered itself under the greatest advantages of an easy intercourse with that quarter? Add to the reasons he had mentioned, that the United States would consult their interest by fixing on the Delaware, as they would not incur the heavy expense of purchasing territory, and erecting magnificent palaces and hotels for the Government, and he thought gentlemen would not hesitate to agree with him.

The place he meant to offer was possessed of eminent superiority, as to salubrity of air and fertility of soil; it also united the advantages of the Atlantic and inland navigation; inasmuch as, by cutting a canal from the waters of the Chesapeake to the Delaware, a communication would be opened from Carolina, Virginia, and Maryland, to New Jersey, Pennsylvania and the midland counties of New York. The spot that he proposed for their acceptance was Wilmington in the State of Delaware; round which they might have a district for exclusive legislation, if it was thought proper to accept it. Under these impressions, he would frame his motion in such a way, as to enable Congress, when they did adjourn to meet at that borough. It was made in this form: To strike out the word "permanent," and all the remainder of the clause, after the words, "ought to be at," and to insert, in lieu of the last, "the borough of Wilmington, in the State of Delaware."

On the question that the House do agree to the said amendment, the yeas and nays were demanded, and are

YEAS—Messrs. Baldwin, Bland, Boudinot, Brown, Burke, Cadwalader, Coles, Contee, Griffin, Gilman, Goodhue, Hartley, Hathorn, Heister, Lawrence, Livermore, P. Muhlenberg, Partridge, Van Rensselaer, Scott, Seney, Sherman, Sylvester, Sinnerickson, Smith, (of Maryland,) Thatcher, Trumbull, Tucker, Wadsworth and Wynkoop—32.

Mr. Boudinot remarked, that the peculiar situation in which he had been placed, by having the Chair of the committee, prevented him from giving his sentiments on the subject then; he therefore hoped to be indulged with stating the claim of the Delaware to the honor of the Federal City. When a question of such great magnitude, and which involved the interests of the Union, was to be decided, he thought he could be neither doing justice to the United States at large, nor his immediate constituents, were he to neglect to call their attention to what the former Congress had done in favor of the Delaware. He was surprised that gentlemen, who contended for the accommodation of their constituents, should be led so far astray from pursuing that object, as to pass far beyond the centre of wealth and population, as well as territory; or, if they did not pass the centre of territory, they went to a place, maugre all that had been said, devoid of those advantages which ought to attend the Federal residence. The want of communication with the Atlantic, the difficulty of navigating its waters, from the innumerable rocks, falls, and shoals, with which it abounds, which, from actual observation, he was induced to believe were insuperable obstructions to a connexion with the western waters; or, if they could be surmounted, it would be at such cost of money and labor, as the United States were not in a condition to expend, at a time when the widows and orphans were starving for want of the pittance due to them by the Government. The sterility of the soil, and the unhealthiness of a situation on the banks of a river which was subject to rise twenty feet and more, and overflow its banks, leaving behind vast quantities of stagnant water, whence proceeded noxious exhalations, the cause of a long catalogue of diseases, were altogether, in his mind, such objections to the place, that he could never imagine a majority of the House could consent to it. He further observed, that the Government would be secluded from the world, and the channels of information; there were few inhabitants, unless it was in the neighborhood of York or Lancaster.

But, besides all these considerations, there was this further, that there was an existing resolution of Congress for erecting the necessary buildings for their accommodation on the banks of the Delaware and Potomac, and an absolute grant of money for the purpose of defraying the expense. Now, as these had each of them strong pretensions, he was willing to have them considered and examined by commissioners sent on the ground. For the sake of accommodation, he would, therefore, move to amend the resolution, by striking out the words "east bank of the river Susquehanna, in the State of Pennsylvania," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "Potomac, Susquehanna, or Delaware."

On the question, that the House do agree to the said amendment, it passed in the negative; the yeas and nays being required, are as follows:

NAYES—Messrs. Ames, Benson, Clymer, Fitzsimons, Floyd, Foster, Gerry, Gilman, Goodhue, Grout, Hartley, Hathorn, Heister, Lawrence, Livermore, P. Muhlenberg, Partridge, Van Rensselaer, Scott, Seney, Sherman, Sylvester, Sinnerickson, Smith, (of Maryland,) Thatcher, Trumbull, Wadsworth and Wynkoop—28.

Mr. Boudinot then moved to amend the resolution, by striking out the words "east bank of the river Susquehanna, in the State of Pennsylvania," and inserting, in lieu thereof, the words, "banks of either side of the river Delaware, not more than eight miles above or below the lower falls of Delaware."

On this question, the yeas and nays were demanded, and are:

YEAS—Messrs. Boudinot, Cadwalader, Gerry, and Sinnerickson—4.

NAYES—Messrs. Ames, Baldwin, Benson, Bland, 1st CON.—29

Brown, Burke, Carroll, Clymer, Coles, Contee, Fitzsimons, Floyd, Foster, Galt, Gilman, Griffin, Grout, Goodhue, Hartley, Hathorn, Heister, Jackson, Lawrence, Lee, Livermore, Madison, Matthews, Moore, Muhlenberg, Page, Partridge, Partridge, Van Rensselaer, Scott, Seney, Sherman, Sylvester, Sinnerickson, Smith, (of Maryland,) Thatcher, Trumbull, Tucker, Wadsworth, and Wynkoop—46.

Mr. STONE then moved to amend the resolution, by striking out the words "east bank," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "banks," and on the question, that the House do agree to the said amendment, the yeas and nays being demanded, were as follow:

YEAS—Messrs. Baldwin, Bland, Boudinot, Brown, Burke, Cadwalader, Carroll, Coles, Contee, Galt, Griffin, Jackson, Lee, Madison, Matthews, Moore, Page, Partridge, Partridge, Van Rensselaer, Scott, Seney, Sherman, Sylvester, Sinnerickson, Smith, (of Maryland,) Stone, Sumter, Tucker, and Wynkoop—26.

NAYES—Messrs. Ames, Benson, Clymer, Fitzsimons, Floyd, Foster, Gerry, Gilman, Goodhue, Grout, Hartley, Hathorn, Heister, Lawrence, Livermore, Muhlenberg, Partridge, Van Rensselaer, Scott, Sherman, Sylvester, Thatcher, Trumbull, Wadsworth, and Wynkoop—25.

So it passed in the affirmative.

A motion was then made, and seconded, further to amend the said resolution, by inserting, after the word "Pennsylvania," the words "or Maryland," and, on the question that the House do agree to the said amendment, it passed in the negative; and the yeas and nays being demanded, were as follow:

YEAS—Messrs. Baldwin, Bland, Boudinot, Brown, Burke, Cadwalader, Carroll, Coles, Contee, Galt, Griffin, Jackson, Lee, Madison, Matthews, Moore, Page, Partridge, Partridge, Van Rensselaer, Scott, Seney, Sherman, Sylvester, Sinnerickson, Smith, (of Maryland,) Stone, Sumter, Tucker, and Wynkoop—25.

NAYES—Messrs. Ames, Benson, Clymer, Fitzsimons, Floyd, Foster, Gerry, Gilman, Goodhue, Grout, Hartley, Hathorn, Heister, Lawrence, Livermore, P. Muhlenberg, Partridge, Van Rensselaer, Scott, Seney, Sherman, Sylvester, Sinnerickson, Smith, (of Maryland,) Thatcher, Trumbull, Wadsworth, and Wynkoop—26.

Mr. LEE expected the question would be divided on the resolution, as it contained two distinct objects, the permanent and temporary residence.

Mr. PAGE suggested the propriety of striking out the latter part of the clause, relating to New York, and to confine the resolution merely to the avowed object, namely, the permanent residence.

The question was taken on striking out, and it passed in the negative, 24 for, 27 against it.

Mr. Vining then moved to strike out the words "City of New York," and insert, in lieu thereof, "Borough of Wilmington, in the State of Delaware," and on the question to agree to the said amendment, the yeas and nays being demanded, were as follow:

YEAS—Messrs. Baldwin, Bland, Boudinot, Brown, Burke, Cadwalader, Carroll, Coles, Contee, Galt, Griffin, Jackson, Lee, Madison, Matthews, Moore, Page, Partridge, Sinnerickson, Sumter, and Vining—21.

Floyd, Foster, Gerry, Gilman, Goodhue, Grout, Hartley, Hathorn, Heister, Lawrence, Livermore, Muhlenberg, Partridge, Van Rensselaer, Scott, Seney, Sherman, Sylvester, Smith (of Maryland), Smith, of South Carolina, Stone, Thatcher, Trumbull, Tucker, Wadsworth, and Wynkoop—30.

So it passed in the negative. Mr. PARKER moved to strike out "New York" and insert "Philadelphia."

Mr. LEE said, the city of New York possessed every convenience and accommodation; he was strongly impressed in favor of the inhabitants; their urbanity and industry did honor to America, and nothing could induce him to vote for striking out the words but a sense of duty. He flattered himself that a regard would now be paid to the great principles of centrality, which Philadelphia possessed in a great degree; the conveniences and accommodations to be found in that city were equal, if not superior to what New York presented; her public buildings and institutions were, he believed, at their command; the inhabitants were industrious, temperate, and frugal; in short, every principle which operated in favor of the Susquehanna, as a permanent residence, applied with equal or more force in favor of Philadelphia as the temporary seat of Government.

Mr. SHERMAN hoped the House were disposed to make as few removals as possible, and that as the buildings for their accommodation might be in readiness in two or three years at the permanent residence, they would be disposed to continue in New York till that time.

On the question, that the House do agree to the said amendment, the yeas and nays being demanded, are as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baldwin, Boudinot, Brown, Burke, Cadwalader, Carroll, Coles, Contee, Gale, Griffin, Heister, Jackson, Lee, Madison, Matthews, Moore, Page, Parker, Sennickson, Stone, Sumter, and Vining—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Benson, Bland, Clymer, Fitzsimons, Floyd, Foster, Gerry, Gilman, Goodhue, Grout, Hartley, Hathorn, Lawrence, Livermore, P. Muhlenberg, Partridge, Van Rensselaer, Scott, Seney, Sherman, Sylvester, Smith (of Maryland), Smith, of South Carolina, Thatcher, Trumbull, Tucker, Wadsworth, and Wynkoop—29.

The main question being put, the second resolution, as amended, was agreed to by the House, in the words following, to wit:

"Resolved, That the permanent seat of the Government of the United States ought to be at some convenient place on the banks of the river Susquehanna, in the State of Pennsylvania; and that, until the necessary buildings be erected for the purpose, the seat of Government ought to continue in the city of New York."

The third resolution, in the words following, being taken up, to wit:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to appoint three Commissioners, to examine and report to him the most eligible situation on the banks of the Susquehanna, in the State of Pennsylvania, for the permanent seat of the Government of the United States; that the said Commissioners be authorized ized, under the direction of the President, to purchase such quantity of land as may be thought necessary, and to erect thereon, within four years, suitable buildings for the accommodation of the Congress, and of the other officers of the United States; that the Secretary of the Treasury, together with the Commissioners so to be appointed, be authorized to borrow a sum, not exceeding one hundred thousand dollars, to be repaid within twenty years, with interest, not exceeding the rate of five per cent. per annum, out of the duties on import and tonnage, to be applied to the purchase of the land, and the erection of buildings aforesaid; and that a bill ought to pass, in the present session, in conformity with the foregoing resolutions."

A motion was made by Mr. GALE, to amend the same, by inserting after the word "aforesaid" the following proviso, viz:

"Provided, nevertheless, that, previous to any such purchase or erection of buildings as aforesaid the Legislature of the States of Pennsylvania and Maryland make such provision for removing all obstructions to the navigation of the said river, between the seat of the Federal Government and the mouth thereof, as may be satisfactory to the President of the United States."

The yeas and nays being demanded, it passed in the negative.

YEAS—Messrs. Baldwin, Boudinot, Brown, Burke, Cadwalader, Carroll, Coles, Contee, Gale, Jackson, Lee, Madison, Matthews, Moore, Page, Parker, Seney, Sennickson, Smith, (of Maryland,) Smith, (of South Carolina,) Stone, Sumter, Tucker, and Vining—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Benson, Clymer, Fitzsimons, Floyd, Foster, Gale, Gilman, Goodhue, Grout, Hartley, Hathorn, Heister, Lawrence, Livermore, Muhlenberg, Partridge, Van Rensselaer, Scott, Seney, Sherman, Sylvester, Smith, (of Maryland,) Stone, Thatcher, Trumbull, Wadsworth, and Wynkoop—28.

And then the main question being put, Do the House agree to the said third resolution, as reported by the committee of the whole House?

The yeas and nays being demanded, it passed in the affirmative.

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Benson, Clymer, Fitzsimons, Floyd, Foster, Gale, Gilman, Goodhue, Grout, Hartley, Hathorn, Heister, Lawrence, Livermore, Muhlenberg, Partridge, Van Rensselaer, Scott, Seney, Sherman, Sylvester, Smith, (of Maryland,) Stone, Thatcher, Trumbull, Wadsworth, and Wynkoop—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Baldwin, Boudinot, Brown, Burke, Cadwalader, Carroll, Coles, Contee, Gerry, Jackson, Lee, Madison, Matthews, Moore, Page, Parker, Sennickson, Smith, (of South Carolina,) Sumter, Tucker, and Vining—21.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the foregoing resolutions, and that Messrs. AMES, LAWRENCE, and CLYMER, do prepare and bring in the same.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate had passed the compensation bill; also, the bill to provide for the safe-keeping of the acts, records, and seal of the United States, with several amendments, to which they desire the concurrence of this House; and the bill for establishing the salaries of the Executive officers of Government, with their assistants and clerks, with amendments; and that they adhere to their amendment to the bill for allowing compensation to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, and to the officers of both Houses; some of which they agree to, and the others they disagree to.

TUESDAY, September 8.

A petition from sundry inhabitants of the State of New Jersey was presented to the House, and read, praying that the seat of the Federal, District, and Circuit Courts, for the State, be fixed at Perth Amboy.

Also, a petition from sundry inhabitants of Georgetown, in the State of Maryland, containing an offer to put themselves and fortunes under the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress, in case the town should be selected as the permanent seat of Government of the United States.

Ordered, That the said petitions do lie on the table.

The House then proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill for establishing the salaries of the Executive officers of Government, with their assistants and clerks. Some of which they agreed to, and others they disagreed to.

Also, to consider the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill to provide for the safe-keeping of the acts, records, and seal of the United States; which was agreed to.

The House proceeded to reconsider the first amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill for allowing compensation to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, and to the officers of both Houses.

Whereupon,

Resolved, That a conference be desired with the Senate, on the subject-matter of the said amendment; and that Messrs. SHERMAN, TUCKER, and BENSON, be appointed managers on the part of this House.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill sent from the Senate, to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States, Mr. Boudinot in the Chair; and, after some time spent in considering the same, the committee rose and reported progress; and then the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, September 9.

Mr. GOODHUE, from the committee to whom were referred the petitions from sundry inhabitants of the States of Rhode Island and North Carolina, presented a bill for suspending the operations of part of an act imposing duties on tonnage; which was received and read a first time.

The House proceeded to consider the petition of the Marquis de Charrier de Lothbiniere, which lay on the table;

Whereupon,

Resolved, That the said petition be rejected. Ordered, That the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from further proceeding on the Message from the President of the United States, of the 10th ultimo; and that the said Message be referred to Messrs. Boudinot, Trumbull, and Burke; and that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion, to the House.

THE JUDICIARY.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill sent from the Senate to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States, Mr. Boudinot in the Chair; and, after some time being spent therein, the committee rose and reported progress.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate insist on their amendment, disagreed to by this House, to the bill for allowing a compensation to the President and Vice President of the United States, and desire a conference with the House, on the subject-matter of the same. They also agree to the conference proposed by this House, on the subject-matter of the first amendment of the Senate to the bill for allowing compensation to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, and to the officers of both Houses; and have appointed managers at the said conference on their part. The Senate also recede from their second and sixth amendments; and insist on their third and fifth amendments, disagreed to by this House, to the bill for establishing the salaries of the Executive officers of Government, with their assistants and clerks.

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the conference desired by the Senate, on the subject-matter of their amendment to the bill for allowing compensation to the President and Vice President of the United States; and that Messrs. BALDWIN, LAWRENCE, and GOODHUE, be appointed managers at the same, on the part of the House.

The House then proceeded to consider the third and fifth amendments, insisted on by the Senate to the bill for establishing the salaries of the Executive officers of Government, with their assistants and clerks;

Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth recede from their disagreement to the said amendments.

The House then proceeded to consider the report of the committee, to whom was referred a letter from the Postmaster General, which lies on the table;

Whereupon,

Resolved, That until further provision be made by law, the General Post Office of the United States shall be conducted according to the rules and regulations prescribed by the ordinances and resolutions of the late Congress; and that contracts be made for the conveyance of the mail in conformity thereto.

On motion made, and seconded, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That money shall not be drawn from the Treasury of the United States, unless by appropriations made or particularly confirmed by acts of Congress, subsequent to the 4th of March last.

[H. OF R.]

Pay of Members.

[SEPTEMBER, 1789.]

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to a committee, consisting of Messrs. HUNTINGTON, BURKE, and GERRY.

On motion, the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, September 10.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to the resolution of this House, of the second ultimo, containing certain articles to be proposed by Congress to the Legislatures of the several States, as amendments to the Constitution of the United States, with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

A bill for suspending the operation of part of an act for imposing duties on tonnage was read the second time, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

PAY OF MEMBERS.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee of Conference, reported, that a conference with the committee of the Senate had taken place upon the subject of discrimination in the pay of the two Houses, proposed as an amendment to the Salary bill, and insisted on by the Senate. The report was, in substance, that they had come to no precise agreement; that the Senate could not be induced to recede from their amendment; but, by way of compromise, the committee on the part of the Senate proposed that the compensation provided for by the present bill should be limited to seven years, the last of which, the compensation of the Senate, to be at seven dollars; or, they proposed that the House should pass a law providing for their own compensation, without including the Senate.

A motion was then made, that this House do recede from their disagreement to the said amendment, by adding to the end of the bill the following clause:

"And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue in force until the fourth of March, in the year 1790, and no longer."

The yeas and nays being demanded, it passed in the negative.

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Baldwin, Benson, Brown, Cadwalader, Clymer, Fitzsimons, Gale, Gerry, Griffin, Hartley, Huntington, Lawrence, Lee, Livermore, Madison, Muhlenberg, Moore, Scott, Sherman, Smith, (of South Carolina,) Trumbull, Vining, and Wynkoop—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Bland, Boudinot, Burke, Carroll, Coles, Contee, Floyd, Foster, Gilman, Goodhue, Grant, Hathorn, Heister, Jackson, Mathews, Page, Partridge, Schureman, Seney, Sylvester, Sunkinson, Stone, Sumter, Thatcher, Tucker, and White—29.

The committee on the petition of the public creditors, and other citizens of Philadelphia, reported, that the petition deserves the attentive consideration of Congress; but as the present session was short, and it was necessary to despatch much important business, now before Congress, it became impracticable to give the subject this session, the attention that it merited. They, therefore, submitted a resolution to the following effect:

Resolved, That it highly concerns the honor and interest of the United States to make some early and effectual provision in favor of the creditors of the Union; and that the House would early next session take this subject into consideration.

Mr. BOUNDNOT then moved, that a committee be appointed to bring in a bill to establish the compensation of the members, and the officers of both Houses, for one year.

The orders of the day for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Land Office bill, also on the Judiciary bill, were read, and postponed until to-morrow. Then the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, September 11.

The engrossed bill for suspending the operation of part of the Tonnage bill was brought in, engrossed, read the third time, and passed.

PAY OF MEMBERS.

Mr. BURKE wished to reconsider the Compensation bill respecting the pay of the members of the two Houses, which fell through yesterday. He was sorry that the House had not laid the bill for compensating the services of the President and Vice President on their table, and retained it as a hostage for the passing of the other through the Senate, without the clause making a discrimination in the pay between the Senate and House of Representatives. As the majority had not taken this precaution, he supposed they would be obliged to agree to the discrimination; the necessity of the case demanded all consideration, as they were obliged, by the Constitution, to fix upon a compensation for their own services; and as the majority had let what he thought a security to them pass out of their reach, he would stick no longer by them.

Mr. JACKSON was sorry to find the gentleman's resolution shaken; for his part, he would rather go without pay than accept it with the condition proposed. He hoped the bill would not be reconsidered; perhaps some expedient might be devised to enable gentlemen to get money enough to defray their expenses, and so warrant them to let the bill die.

Mr. BURKE said, while there was any prospect of successfully opposing the proposition of the Senate he held out; but as the House had let slip the only opportunity they had of contending with them on equal ground, he was disposed to give up the contest.

Mr. MADISON was extremely anxious that an accommodation should take place; but he was apprehensive that the proposed motion of reconsidering the bill, if successful, would be attended with dangerous consequences. He supposed the vote of yesterday amounted to a direct negative on the bill: of course it was lost, and could not be revived. He supposed that certain forms were necessary, in the passage of a bill, in order to prevent surprise, and he thought that this conduct would amount to a very summary proceeding. A full House might one day reject a bill, which a thin House might pass the subsequent morning. Considering all these circumstances, he was inclined to think the motion was out of order.

Judiciary.

Mr. SHERMAN conceived the bill to be still before the House, and was in favor of reconsideration.

Mr. GERRY entertained the same sentiments as the gentleman from Virginia with respect to the restoration of a bill that was lost; but he by no means conceived that to be the case with the present. The bill was still before the House, the vote of yesterday was not carried to the Senate, and the bill was still on the table. He thought, under these circumstances, they might reconsider the vote of yesterday if the majority acquiesced in the same opinion.

Mr. LAWRENCE joined in opinion with Mr. GERRY.

Mr. VINING conceived the question to be of importance, and had examined the Parliamentary proceedings of Britain; not that he supposed the House bound by the lex parliamentaria of that nation, but as many of their rules were correspondent, it might influence the judgment, especially as it was presumable that the rules of that body were founded in experience. He adduced a case in point, which happened in July, 1768.

Some further conversation took place on the question of order, when the motion to reconsider was declared by the Chair to be in order. An appeal being made from this decision, it was determined by the House to be in order—30 to 24.

And then the question on Mr. BURKE's motion being put, that the House do now proceed to reconsider the proceedings of yesterday on the Compensation bill, so far as relates to the adherence of the House to their disagreement to the adherence amendment, making a discrimination between the pay of the members of the two branches of the Legislature, it was determined in the affirmative. The yeas and nays being required, are, YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Baldwin, Benson, Boudinot, Brown, Burke, Cadwalader, Carroll, Clymer, Fitzsimons, Gale, Gerry, Griffin, Hartley, Huntington, Lawrence, Lee, Livermore, Madison, Moore, Muhlenberg, Page, Scott, Sherman, Smith, (of South Carolina,) Trumbull, Vining, Wadsworth, and Wynkoop—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Bland, Coles, Contee, Floyd, Foster, Gilman, Goodhue, Grant, Hathorn, Heister, Jackson, Mathews, Parker, Partridge, Van Rensselaer, Schureman, Seney, Sylvester, Sunkinson, Smith, (of Maryland,) Stone, Sumter, Thatcher, Tucker, and White—25.

A motion was then made to agree to the amendment of the Senate, with an amendment, by adding to the end of the bill the following clause:

"And be it further enacted, That this clause shall continue in force till the first day of March, in the year 1790, and no longer."

And the question being put thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative. The yeas and nays being required, are as follow:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Baldwin, Benson, Boudinot,

Brown, Burke, Cadwalader, Carroll, Clymer, Fitzsimons, Gale, Gerry, Griffin, Hartley, Huntington, Lawrence, Lee, Livermore, Madison, Moore, Muhlenberg, Scott, Sherman, Smith, (of South Carolina,) Trumbull, Vining, Wadsworth, and Wynkoop—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Bland, Coles, Contee, Floyd, Foster, Gilman, Goodhue, Grant, Hathorn, Heister, Jackson, Mathews, Page, Parker, Partridge, Van Rensselaer, Schureman, Seney, Sylvester, Sunkinson, Smith, (of Maryland,) Stone, Sumter, Thatcher, Tucker, and White—26.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Judiciary bill; and, after some time spent in considering the same, the committee rose and reported progress.

SATURDAY, September 12.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they had agreed to their amendment to the Compensation bill.

JUDICIARY BILL.

The House went again into a Committee of the Whole on the Judiciary bill, Mr. BOUNDNOT in the Chair; and, after spending some time upon it, they reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

MONDAY, September 14.

COLLECTION OF DUTIES.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they have passed the bill for suspending part of the act for regulating the collection of duties imposed on the tonnage of ships or vessels, and on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States, with several amendments, to which they request the concurrence of the House. The House proceeded to reconsider the above amendments, and agreed to them.

JUDICIARY BILL.

The House then again went into a Committee of the Whole on the Judiciary bill, Mr. BOUNDNOT in the Chair; and having gone through the same, reported it to the House with several amendments, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. AMES, from the committee appointed for the purpose, presented a bill to establish the seat of the Government of the United States.

TUESDAY, September 15.

The bill to establish the seat of the Government of the United States was read the second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole, to the bill to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States, which being concurred with, the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

POST OFFICE.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they have passed a bill for the temporary establishment of the Post Office; to which they request the concurrence of this House.

WEDNESDAY, September 16.

The bill for the temporary establishment of the Post Office was read the first time.

On motion, Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill for amending the act to regulate the collection of the duties imposed by law on the tonnage of ships or vessels, and on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States; and that Messrs. SHERMAN, GOODHUE, and CONTEE, form said committee.

Another committee, consisting of Messrs. BURKE, MOORE, and LAWRENCE, was appointed, to bring in a bill for establishing the salaries of the Judicial Department.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, by the Secretary of War, together with a letter from the Governor of the Western territory, therein referred to: The said Message was read, and is as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

The Governor of the Western territory has made a statement to me of the reciprocal hostilities of the Wabash Indians and the white people inhabiting the frontiers, bordering on the river Ohio, which I herewith lay before Congress.

The United States, in Congress assembled, by their acts of the 21st day of July, 1787, and of the 12th day of August, 1788, made a provisional arrangement for calling forth the militia of Virginia and Pennsylvania, in the proportions therein specified.

As the circumstances which occasioned the said arrangement continue nearly the same, I think proper to suggest to your consideration the expediency of making some temporary provision for calling forth the militia of the United States, for the purposes stated in the Constitution, which would embrace the cases apprehended by the Governor of the Western territory.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

September 16, 1789.

The following being enclosed was also read:

NEW YORK, September 24, 1789.

SIR:—The constant hostilities between the Indians who live upon the river Wabash, and the people of Kentucky, must necessarily be attended with such embarrassing circumstances to the government of the Western territory, that I am induced to request you will be pleased to take the matter into consideration, and give me the orders you may think proper.

It is not to be expected, sir, that the Kentucky people will, or can submit, patiently, to the cruelties and depredations of those savages; they are in the habit of retaliation, perhaps without attending precisely to the nations from which the injuries are received. They will continue to retaliate, or they will apply to the Governor of the Western country (through which the Indians must pass to attack them) for redress; if he cannot redress them, (and, in present circumstances, he cannot,) they also will march through that country to redress themselves, and the Government will be laid prostrate. The United States, on the other hand, are at peace with several of the nations; and, should the resentment of these people fall upon any of them—which it is likely enough may happen—very bad consequences may follow; for it must appear to them that the United States either pay no regard to their treaties, or that they are unable or unwilling to carry their engagements into effect. Remonstrances will probably be made by them, also, to the Governor, and he will be found in a situation from which he can neither redress the one nor protect the other; they will unite with the hostile nations, preferring open war to a delusive and uncertain peace.

By a resolution of the late Congress, the Governor of the Western territory had power, in case of hostilities, to call upon Virginia and Pennsylvania for a number of men to act in conjunction with the Continental troops, and carry war into the Indian settlements; that resolution, it is now supposed, is no longer in force. The revival of it might be of use, as it would tend to conciliate the western people, by showing them that they were not unattended to, and would, in some measure, justify me in holding a language to the Indians, which might obviate the necessity of employing force against them.

The handful of troops, sir, that are scattered in that country, though they may afford protection to some settlements, cannot positively act offensively by themselves.

I have the honor to be, sir,

Your most obedient and humble servant,

ARTHUR ST. CLAIR.

To the President of the United States.

The said Message was referred to Messrs. BOUNDINOT, TRUMBULL, and BURKE, to examine the matter thereof, and report the same to the House.

THURSDAY, September 17.

Mr. GOODHUE, from the committee appointed for the purpose, presented a bill to amend part of the Tonnage act, which was read the first time.

The bill sent from the Senate, for the temporary establishment of the Post Office, was read the second and third time, and passed.

The bill for establishing the Judicial Courts of the United States was read the third time and passed.

Mr. BOUNDINOT, from the committee appointed for the purpose, presented a bill to recognise and adapt, to the Constitution of the United States, the establishment of the troops raised under the resolves of the United States in Congress assembled, which was read a first and second time, and referred to a committee of the whole House.

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Treasury do report to this House an estimate of the sums requisite to be appropriated, during the present session of Congress, towards defraying the expenses of the Civil List, and of the Department of War, to the end of the present year; and for satisfying such warrants as have been drawn by the late Board of the Treasury, and which may not heretofore have been paid.

Mr. BURKE, from the committee appointed for the purpose, presented a bill for allowing certain compensation to the Judges of the Supreme and other Courts, which was read the first and second time, and ordered to be referred to a committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Permanent Seat of Government.

[H. or R.]

Ordered, That the Committee of Ways and Means be discharged from further proceeding on the business referred to them, and that it be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, to report thereon.

SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.

The House then resolved into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to establish the seat of the Government of the United States, Mr. BOUNDINOT in the Chair.

Mr. VINING moved to strike out the first paragraph of the bill, in order to insert one to this effect: "That a district of ten miles square, comprehending the borough of Wilmington, in the State of Delaware, to be located as hereafter directed, should be selected as the seat of Government of the United States, until a more eligible place shall be fixed upon for the permanent seat; and that measures should be taken to accommodate Congress with that district, as soon as conveniently might be; provided that no cession be accepted till acts should be passed by the States of Maryland and Pennsylvania to open a water communication between the Chesapeake and Delaware."

This motion was negatived, being 23 for, and 28 against it.

Mr. GALE then moved to amend the first clause by adding the following: "That no district be accepted as aforesaid, until the President of the United States shall be satisfied of the practicability of effecting a navigation from the seat of Government to the mouth of the said river; and that this law shall not be carried into effect, until the States of Pennsylvania and Maryland shall pass acts (not including any expense to the said States,) providing for removing the obstructions of the same."

Mr. HARTLEY was not well acquainted with the navigation of the Susquehanna at the Maryland line, but, from his knowledge of the other part of the river, and the inference from the works carrying on above Havre-de-Grace, he was led to believe the navigation practicable at a small expense. Indeed, without the improvements which art might bestow, he believed it navigable. As a reason for this opinion, he mentioned the circumstance of Mr. William Tennet going down and returning with a ton of iron to the mouth of the Codorus but a short time since.

The Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania had declared the Susquehanna a highway; consequently it was in the power of companies formed and forming, to remove every impediment to the navigation. If there was no doubt of the practicability of the navigation, and he assured the committee there was none, of what use was it to adopt the clause? He hoped gentlemen did not mean to throw unnecessary embarrassments in the way, and their candor, he trusted, would induce them to relinquish a proposition which had no other tendency.

Mr. MADISON.—If the observations made by the gentleman last up have the weight which he wishes them, I am sure they ought to produce an unanimous concurrence to the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland. Whatever diversity of opinion may exist with respect to the merits of the main question, I trust we shall all agree that our decision ought to be as much in favor of the interest of the United States as we have in our power to make it; and this will be done by securing a communication with the Atlantic navigation. The gentleman tells us that there is no doubt of the practicability of opening the navigation of the Susquehanna; if so, ought we not to make it a condition of our fixing on that river? I can see no reasonable objection, therefore, to the motion. It is possible the State of Pennsylvania may refuse her concurrence; this would defeat our object, if the practicability was ever so apparent; it is certainly prudent in the United States to guard against such a contingency. If Pennsylvania will agree, we do no injury to her by making it a condition; if she would not agree, would it not argue a great inattention, and want of prudence in us to put our best interest so much in her power? So that viewing the question on either side, it is proper to be adopted.

Mr. STONE observed that the weight of the arguments turned upon the practicability of this navigation; if now, it should be found that these arguments were grounded upon what is not the fact, it will be an insuperable reason against Congress fixing on that river; whereas, if the gentleman's observations were well founded, and he had no doubt but they were, as the gentleman lived in the neighborhood of the Susquehanna, the navigation would be found practicable, and Congress would go there of course; but what good reason could be adduced against securing to the General Government the power of removing the obstacles to the navigation?

As to what had been said of making the river a highway, it was of no importance; for he supposed all navigable rivers were highways from their nature; but this gave no right to a company to erect works for clearing the obstructions. He observed that this was the idea entertained by the Legislatures of Maryland and Virginia, who had entered into positive laws, empowering a company to erect such works, and receive toll for their indemnification.

Mr. CLYMER supposed that gentlemen were not acquainted with the practice of the State of Pennsylvania; rivers there are not public highways until they are declared so by law, before which the navigation might be obstructed by milldams or other works erected upon the stream; all which must be removed when a river is declared a public highway. Formerly that State was jealous of the trade going out of her hands by the Susquehanna; but a different policy has lately prevailed, and she has evinced a ready disposition to join with the neighboring States in clearing out the bed of the river, or by other means improving the navigation; so that the object of the proviso, so far as it depended upon Pennsylvania, is already accomplished; and it would be improper to make our removal to the Susquehanna depend upon the consent of another State, whose interest it might be to oppose it.

Mr. LEE looked upon the clause as a very proper one, and as consistent with the principles laid down by the House, for the communication of the Western territory with the Atlantic ocean.

Mr. JACKSON inquired, whether the State of Pennsylvania had not the power to repeal that law which declared the Susquehanna to be a public highway? If they had it, and he did not doubt but what they possessed it, what would become of Congress when they are fixed upon the banks of that river, secluded from the world and totally cut off from a water communication with the Atlantic? He asked whether it would be prudent for the General Government to subject itself to such inconveniences, when they had it in their power to make their own terms?

Mr. FITZSIMONS wished gentlemen to consider whether it was absolutely necessary to have a water communication with the Atlantic ocean and the Western Territory? For his part, he had never understood it to be absolutely necessary, nor did the preamble to the resolution, adopted by the House some time ago, warrant such a proposition.

Mr. GALE doubted whether the obstructions could be removed out of the Susquehanna; indeed, he understood from a gentleman who was well acquainted with that river, that it never could be made navigable. He thought this point ought to be ascertained before Congress fixed themselves there.

Mr. SCOTT presumed the gentleman alluded to some conversation that had passed out of doors, but he appeared to misconceive it. He had said that it was next to impossible to remove all the obstructions in the navigation of that river: he was still of the same opinion, if it was understood that it should be navigated by large ships; but if gentlemen would be satisfied with a navigation by canoes, or even large boats, he believed such a navigation practicable.

He expressed his obligation to the gentlemen who were so desirous of accommodating the inhabitants near the Susquehanna with a ready road to market; but he did not think it a Continental concern, whether they sold the produce of their labor at Philadelphia or Baltimore.

He was surprised at gentlemen for insisting upon absolute water communication with the Atlantic. Did they expect that Congress must be supplied with what they wanted by that means? Could not a land carriage of thirty miles be as commodious as fifty miles of water carriage against a rapid stream? He could not see any advantage which Congress were to reap from this scheme; but he could discover the benefit which would result to Maryland from opening the navigation. If Congress meant to interfere, and give a preference to the Baltimore market over the Philadelphia, they had better do it openly and fairly, than in this covert manner.

Mr. STONE desired the question to be divided, in order to take the sense of the committee on each part separately.

Whereupon, the proposition was divided at the word river, and the sense of the committee given against it; there being 25 for, and 29 opposed to its adoption.

The question was then put on the second part, and the committee divided, 27 and 27. It then lay with the Chairman to decide, which he did by giving his vote in the affirmative.

The committee then went through the bill, and after agreeing to it, reported it with an amendment.

The House adopted the amendment, and Mr. GALE proposed to insert the words "or Maryland," so that it might be in the discretion of the commissioners to fix upon the banks of the Susquehanna, either in Maryland or Pennsylvania.

Mr. FITZSIMONS inquired of the gentleman what part of the State of Maryland, lying on the Susquehanna, was fit for a Federal town?

Mr. GALE could not tell precisely, but he apprehended some place near the tide-water might be found.

Mr. HARTLEY was sorry to trouble the House so often; but he could not restrain himself when he conceived gentlemen were aiming to throw embarrassments in the way of the bill. He called upon gentlemen to show the propriety of the amendment, by mentioning a spot fit for the seat of Government of Maryland, upon the banks of that river? The Maryland line is about twenty-five miles below Wright's Ferry, and ten or twelve above tide-water; a place exposed to the depredation of hostile nations. If this consideration is of no weight, we had better stay where we are, or seek a more central commercial city. He trusted gentlemen would not throw all they had hitherto done into confusion again, by adopting amendments of this nature.

On the question, the House divided equally, 27 and 27; and it lay with the SPEAKER to determine, which he did by giving his vote in the negative.

On motion, the further consideration of the bill was postponed, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, September 18.

Mr. HEISTER, from the committee appointed for the purpose, presented a bill making provision for the invalid Pensioners of the United States, which was read a first time.

The bill to amend part of the Tonnage act was read the second time, and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

On motion,

Resolved, That it be the duty of the Secretary of State to procure, from time to time, such of the statutes of the several States as may not be in his office.

This resolution was sent to the Senate, and shortly after returned with their concurrence.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom it was referred to examine into the measures taken by Congress and the State of Virginia, respecting the lands reserved for the use of the officers and soldiers of the said State, on Continental and State establishments, in the session made by the said State to the United States, of the territory north-west of the river Ohio.

Whereupon, it was Ordered, That the further consideration of that report be postponed until the next session of Congress.

COMPENSATION TO THE JUDICIARY.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for allowing a compensation to the Judges of the Supreme and other Courts, and to the Attorney General of the United States. Mr. BOURDINOR in the Chair.

Mr. GOODHUE moved to strike out four thousand five hundred dollars, the proposed salary of the Chief Justice, in order to reduce it.

Mr. BURKE had been opposed to this sum when he was in the select committee that brought in the bill, but a majority was against him there, and so it was adopted. He, however, still maintained his former opinion.

Mr. LAWRENCE had been on the committee alluded to by the gentleman; he was then in favor of four thousand five hundred dollars, and was so still. He did not, he said, think it was too much, considering the very important nature of the duties assigned to that officer, and the high trust committed to his care. The laws and the Constitution of the United States are committed into his hands. We are to look for decisions on the most interesting points to the Judges of the Supreme Court; and on their decisions depend causes of the greatest possible magnitude.

The sum proposed he did not think would be considered too high; there is a predilection among the people in favor of their Judges; it is the general opinion, that they should be well paid. This sentiment is honorable to the people; it is productive of the happiest effects, and ought to be encouraged. He was willing, he said, to risk his popularity, by voting for that sum; he did not think it would be considered too high; and would rather be for increasing than diminishing it. When we consider what is paid to similar officers in other countries, we find that these salaries bear no proportion to their allowances. To induce gentlemen of the first abilities to come forward, and to place them in that situation which shall be above temptation, you cannot give them a less sum. It will be of very little consequence, whether the Judges hold their seats during good behaviour, if you do not make them independent in their salaries. He, therefore, hoped the sum would not be struck out.

Mr. GOODHUE said, he did not think there was any propriety in referring to other countries for examples on this occasion; circumstances did not apply. We must have a regard to the ideas of our own people, and the situation of our own country; and the only inquiry, in his opinion, was, what has been customary, and what may be necessary in the present case? He then referred to the salaries which are given in particular States; and though, in some instances, they are below what they ought to be, yet they command the first abilities. The sum proposed in the bill is so much beyond all example in any of the States, that it will be considered beyond the abilities of the people. The grants we have already made are in general so high, and will excite so much uneasiness, that he was in hopes they would not have proceeded one step further in that line of policy. He wished the motion might obtain.

Mr. HENSON said, that an ample allowance was necessary, in order to command the first abilities. There was no doubt, he observed, but plenty of candidates might be found, who would serve for fifteen hundred dollars, or for a less sum. Instances may be mentioned of persons offering to serve as Governor, in some of the States, for five hundred dollars; but if it is intended to have the office respectable, by its being filled with men of competent abilities, a less sum than that proposed will not be found adequate.

Mr. AMES said, he had frequently heard in the House abstract reasonings upon the subject of salaries and compensations; but, for his part, he thought such reasonings had very little to do in the business. The only inquiry was, what sum would be necessary to command the first abilities in the respective States? The gentlemen, from various quarters, may determine, with a great degree of precision, for themselves; he thought he could speak for the four New England States; and supposed that fifteen hundred dollars per annum, for this officer, would be an object sufficient to excite the attention of men of the first abilities in those States.

Gentlemen might be found, he said, who would use the greatest exertions to qualify themselves for the office. He, therefore, hoped the motion for striking out the sum would obtain.

Mr. LIVERMORE was clearly of opinion, that these officers ought to receive a compensation for their services; and this he took to be the true data from whence to determine what would be a proper allowance. If the committee consider it in this point of view, they would inquire what was the business which the Federal Judges would have to perform? He had endeavored to fix this in his own mind, and from the considerations that had occurred to him, he was led to conclude, that their duty would not be a fourth part of what was attached to the State Judiciaries. Hence the inference was, that they ought to be satisfied with salaries much lower than those proposed in the bill.

Mr. VINING was in favor of the sum mentioned in the report. He stated the amount of the whole expense to be incurred, and contrasted it with the benefits to be derived to the United States from the institution. The object, he said, was to attract and command the first abilities. There are many gentlemen in the practice of law, whose abilities command a greater income than three thousand dollars per annum. Can it be expected that such persons will relinquish their lucrative professions, merely for serving the United States? It cannot be expected; and yet, he presumed, the very first abilities were the objects to be obtained.

Mr. GERRY approved of the motion. He enumerated the debts, taxes, and burdens of the people; from whence he urged the necessity of the utmost prudence and economy in the expenditures and appropriations. He referred to the situation of Great Britain, and contrasted our circumstances with theirs. He said the salary of the Chief Justice ought to be about four hundred pounds sterling. He referred to what had been said respecting the incomes of lawyers; and said, he believed, where there was one who got three thousand dollars a year by his practice there were twenty who did not get one-third of that sum. He conceived that a much less sum than that proposed would command the first abilities on the continent. He would ask gentlemen, if the State Judges were men of inferior character? Yet they served for much less pay than what is now proposed.

Mr. JACKSON said, he did not doubt the truth of what the gentleman mentioned respecting the lawyers. But he would ask, if Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States were to be taken from the lowest class of lawyers? There was no doubt, he said, but that Judges might be obtained for five hundred pounds, but what kind of law? What kind of decisions would you get from such Judges? There are lawyers in some of the States, who make from fifteen hundred to two thousand guineas a year by their great abilities. Will such men relinquish their emoluments for the honor of serving the United States?

I have received some accounts from the Southward, by which I find, that gentlemen are declining public appointments, on account of the smallness of the salaries. We ought to consider the great importance of this officer; that the lives, the properties, and rights of the citizens are to depend on his decisions; that the preservation of the Constitution of the United States, and of the individual States, depends, in a great measure, on the wisdom, impartiality, and independency of this officer; and, in cases of impeachment, the President of the United States is to be tried by him; all the great appeals, and matters of treaty, are subjected to his decision. From these considerations, the first abilities should be procured; and ample and generous allowance ought to be given, so that every possible inducement to an undue bias and influence may be taken away.

Mr. PAGE had no doubt but the first characters would be attained to fill these very important offices; but he feared that a low salary would render them less independent than they ought to be. Gentlemen would make more at the bar, than they would make on the bench, which would prevent the most eminent from offering themselves. He feared this from the situation of the Judges in Virginia. They were formerly allowed five hundred pounds per annum; but, in the rage for reducing salaries, they were lowered to three hundred pounds. It was very questionable, if the present Judges were to fall off, whether they could renew the bench with men of equal characters. He feared this rage for reducing salaries; it was supposed, by many, to be republican, but he entertained a different opinion; and doubted not but experience would sorrowfully demonstrate that low salaries are anti-republican; that, as you reduce your officers to scanty allowances, you depreciate the Government, and when the day of trouble arrives which tries men's souls, we shall lament the want of firmness and vigor in those who fill the Judiciary of the United States.

Mr. SMITH (of South Carolina) was against reducing this sum. He adverted to the circumstance of raising the salaries of the Judges in England, at the accession of the present King, from the idea of rendering them more independent than they had been. He then stated the amount of their salaries, and the situation of the people in that country, in respect to public burdens.

He then referred to the salaries of the Judges in several of the States; and pointed out the proportion of the expense which the Judiciary of the State of South Carolina bore to the amount of their Civil List, and made it one third; whereas, the Judiciary of the United States would not amount to one-eighth. He pointed out the necessity of holding out such inducements as would influence the first abilities to accept of the appointment; and urged the importance of making the Judges independent. The Judicial department he considered to be the sheet anchor of the Constitution; a department of the first consequence to the Union; a department which, in all civilized countries, is placed in an eligible and independent situation.

Mr. MADISON said, he did not wish to trouble the committee with a recapitulation of observations respecting the first abilities; but he would observe, that it ought to be considered, that these Judges must make a new acquisition of legal knowledge. They must have a familiar acquaintance with the laws of every State; they must understand the nature of treaties, and especially the treaties now subsisting between these States and foreign countries. These studies will absorb a great deal of their time.

When we consider the duties that will devolve upon them; they strike the mind as being of the greatest magnitude: they are the guardians of the Laws and of the Constitution of the United States, and, I trust, of the individual States also.

When we consider the great and important causes, in which opulent individuals will be parties, that are to come under their cognizance, we must be struck with the propriety of shielding these Judges from all possible assaults of temptation: to these, if we add, important cases of treason, in which the greatest interests will be involved, the idea will receive additional force. Upon the whole, considering the circumstances of the people, he said, he should disagree to the sum proposed by the committee; but, at the same time, should not agree to the proposed reduction.

On the question for striking out 4,500, it was carried in the affirmative. It was then proposed to fill the blank with 4,000, which was agreed to.

Compensation to the Judiciary.

After going through the bill, and making alterations in almost every salary, upon the foregoing principles, the committee rose, and reported the bill as amended.

After which, the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, September 19.

The engrossed bill for amending part of the act to regulate the collection of the duties, was read the third time and passed.

A bill, making provision for the invalid Pensioners of the United States, was read the second time.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that they had passed an act to regulate processes in the courts of the United States, to which they request the concurrence of the House; also, that they agree to some, and disagree to others, of the amendments proposed by this House to the bill for establishing the Judicial Courts of the United States.

Mr. PARKER, from the committee appointed for the purpose, presented a bill concerning the importation of certain persons, prior to the year 1808, which was read the first time; and, on motion, ordered, that the further consideration of the said bill be postponed until the next session of Congress.

The House then took into consideration the amendments to the Constitution, as amended by the Senate; and after some time spent thereon, the business was postponed till to-morrow.

The House then proceeded to consider the amendments reported yesterday, by the Committee of the Whole, to the bill allowing compensation to the Judges and Attorney General, when the salary of 4,000 dollars to the Chief Justice, agreed to yesterday by the Committee of the Whole, was reduced to 3,500; and some other similar alterations were made; when it was ordered that the bill be engrossed; and, after some time, the bill was read a third time and passed the House. Adjourned.

MONDAY, September 21.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that they recede from their amendment to the bill for allowing compensation to the President and Vice President of the United States; that they have also passed the Judges' Compensation bill, with several amendments; to which they request the concurrence of the House.

The House then proceeded to consider the amendments:

Whereupon, Resolved, That this House agree to the first, second, and third amendments; and disagree to the fourth amendment of the said bill.

Another message from the Senate was received, informing the House, that they have agreed to the following resolution; to which they desire the concurrence of the House.

Resolved, That it be recommended to the Legislature of the several States, to pass laws making it exactly the duty of the keepers of their jails, to receive, and safe keep therein, all prisoners committed under the authority of the United States, until they shall be discharged by the due course of the laws thereof; under the like penalties, as in case of prisoners committed under the authority of such States respectively; the United States to pay for the use and safe-keeping of such jails, at the rate of fifty cents per month for each prisoner, that shall, under their authority, be committed thereto, during the time such prisoners shall be therein confined; also, to support such of said prisoners as shall be committed for offences.

The said resolution being twice read, was agreed to by the House.

A bill making appropriations for the service of the present year, was read a second time, and ordered to be referred to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The House then proceeded to consider the report of the committee upon the petition of the Baron de Glaubeck:

Whereupon, it was Resolved, That the Baron de Glaubeck be allowed the pay of a Captain, from the ninth day of March, 1781, to the twenty-fourth day of August, 1782, having undertaken the command thereof at the request, and by order of the Commander-in-chief of the Southern Army.

Another message was received from the Senate, informing the House that the Senate recede from their fourth amendment to the Judges and Attorney General's Compensation bill; also, from their third amendment to the Constitution of the United States; and do insist on the other amendments to the said articles disagreed to by the House; and that they have agreed to a conference on this subject.

The House then proceeded to consider the report from the committee on the memorial and petition of the public creditors of Pennsylvania; after which, they came to the following resolutions:

Resolved, That this House consider an adequate provision for the support of public credit as a matter of high importance to the national honor and prosperity. Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to prepare a plan for that purpose, and to report the same to this House at its next meeting.

On motion, it was then ordered, that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to apply to the Supreme Executives of the several States, for statements of their public debts—of the funds provided for the payment, in whole or in part, of the principal and interest thereof; and of the amount of the loan-office certificates, or other public securities of the United States, in the State Treasuries respectively; and that he report to the House such of said documents as he may obtain, at the next session of Congress.

The House then proceeded to reconsider such of the amendments to the Judiciary bill as had been disagreed to by the Senate; and adopted them without debate.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the necessary appropriations for the current year was received, read, and referred to Messrs.

WADSWORTH, SMITH, (of Maryland,) and SMITH, (of South Carolina.)

The House then resumed the consideration of the amendments proposed by the Senate to the several articles of amendments to the Constitution of the United States; some of which they agreed to, and disagreed to others, two-thirds of the members present concurring in each vote: whereupon, a committee of conference was desired with the Senate on the subject-matter of the amendments disagreed to; and Messrs. MADISON, SHERMAN, and Vining, were appointed managers on the part of the House.

Mr. JACKSON moved for leave to bring in a bill to alter the time of the annual meeting of Congress; this motion was agreed to.

SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.

And then the House proceeded to consider the bill to establish the seat of Government of the United States, which lay on the table, with the amendments, as reported by the Committee of the whole House.

Mr. SMITH proposed to confine the choice of a situation on the banks of the Susquehanna, between Checkislungo creek and the mouth of the river. He was seconded by Mr. SNEY.

Mr. HARTLEY hoped the committee would limit it as near the spot contemplated as possible.

Mr. HEISTER said, he moved, the other day, for a particular spot on the river, which he conceived entitled to a preference; if the proposed motion obtained, that place would be excluded, and he should hesitate respecting his vote upon the bill.

Mr. SNEY by no means wished to embarrass the committee; if the motion proposed, would, any how, have that effect, he should withdraw his second.

Mr. MADISON felt himself compelled to move for striking out that part of the bill which provided that the temporary residence of Congress should continue at New York; as he conceived it irreconcilable with the spirit of the Constitution. If it was not from viewing it in this light, he should have given the bill no further opposition; and now he did not mean to enter on the merits of the main question.

From the Constitution, it appeared that the concurrence of the two Houses of Congress was sufficient to enable them to adjourn from one place to another; nay, the legal consent of the President was, in some degree, prescribed in the 7th section of article 1st, where it is declared, that every order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary, (except on a question of adjournment,) shall be presented to the President of the United States, and approved by him, before the same shall take effect. Any attempt, therefore, to adjourn by law, is a violation of that part of the Constitution which gives the power, exclusively, to the two branches of the Legislature. If gentlemen saw it in the same light, he flattered himself they would reject that part of the bill; and, however little they valued the reflection that this city was not central, which had been so often urged, they would be guided by arguments springing from a superior source.

He would proceed to state the reasons which induced him to be of this opinion: it is declared in the Constitution, that neither House, during the session of Congress, shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days; nor to any place than that in which the two Houses shall be sitting; from hence he inferred, that the two Houses, by a concurrence, could adjourn for more than three days, and to any other place which they thought proper; by the other clause he had mentioned, the Executive power is restrained from any interference with the Legislature on this subject; hence, he concluded, it would be dangerous to attempt to give to the President a power which the Constitution expressly denied him. He did not suppose that the attempt to vest the Executive with a power over the adjournment of the Legislature would absolutely convey the power, but he conceived it wrong to make the experiment. He submitted it to those gentlemen who were attached to the success of the bill, how far an unconstitutional declaration may impede its passage through the other branch of the Legislature.

It has been supposed by some, that the seat of Government may be at a place different from that where the Congress sits; and, although the former may be established by law, the Legislature might remove elsewhere; he could not subscribe to this doctrine. What is the Government of the United States for which a seat is to be provided? Will not the Government necessarily comprehend the Congress as a part? In arbitrary Governments, the residence of the monarch may be styled the seat of Government, because he is within himself the supreme Legislative, Executive, and Judicial power; the same may be said of the residence of a limited monarchy, where the efficiency of the Executive operates, in a great degree, to the exclusion of the Legislative authority; but in such a Government as ours, according to the legal and common acceptance of the term, Government must include the Legislative power; so the term Administration, which in other countries is specially appropriated to the Executive branch of Government, is used here for both the Executive and Legislative branches; we, in official communications, say Legislative Administration or Executive Administration, according as the one or the other is employed in the exercise of its constitutional powers. He mentioned these circumstances to show that they ought not to look for the meaning of terms used in the laws and Constitution of the United States, into the acceptance of them in other countries, whose situation and Government were different from that of United America. If his reasoning was just, he should conclude that the seat of Government would be at that place where both the Executive and Legislative bodies are fixed; and this depended upon the vote of the two branches of the Legislature. There was another clause favorable to this opinion; it was, that giving Congress authority to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States; this was the only place where any thing respecting the seat of Government was mentioned; and would any gentleman contend that Congress might have a seat of Government over which they are empowered to exercise exclusive legislation, and yet reside at the distance of two or 300 miles from it? Such a construction would contradict the plain and evident meaning of the Constitution, and as such was inadmissible.

He hoped these observations would be attended to; and did not doubt but if seen in their true light they would induce the House to reject that part of the bill which he moved to have struck out.

Mr. SHERMAN acknowledged that Congress possessed the power of adjournment as it respected time and place, independent of the President; but he conceived there was a propriety in declaring where the seat of Government should be by law, in order that those officers who were called upon by the Constitution to be present at the seat of Government might know where to repair. He admitted that Congress, notwithstanding this declaration in the law, might adjourn to some other place.

Mr. PAGE would inquire where was the necessity of adherence to a clause which its warmest advocates must allow had no binding force as it related to its main object, namely, the continuance of the two Houses to sit in this city?

Mr. LAWRENCE was in hopes that the opposition to the bill had ceased, at least he did not expect that arguments of this kind would be brought forward at this time. The gentlemen who opposed the clause, declaring the temporary residence to be at New York, as contrary to the Constitution, urged nothing against it when it was severally proposed to be at Wilmington and Philadelphia; if he did not mistake, the gentlemen voted in favor of those places. From hence he was led to believe that a legal declaration on this point was not at that time unconstitutional, even in their opinion; and if it would have been proper with respect to one place, he could not think it improper as it respected another.

But he was induced to make this declaration, in order to give operation to some of the laws they had already passed. The law establishing the Judicial Courts of the United States made it the duty of the Judges to hold the Supreme Court at the seat of Government: how are they to discover where the seat of Government is unless it be declared? And admitting that the seat of Government is defined best by being at the place where Congress deliberates, how will it be ascertained if we should happen not to be in session? And this may be the case, for leave is already given to alter the time of our annual meeting, and how far that period may be extended into the ensuing year is altogether unknown.

The honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. MADISON) tells us, that Congress have a right to adjourn, by concurrence, to where they please, and that their presence makes the seat of Government; yet, at the same time, he is an advocate for fixing a permanent seat of Government; there is surely some inconsistency in these ideas. Although Congress shall have fixed a permanent seat of Government, they retain the power of removing to where they think proper; hence, if they remove from their permanent seat, there becomes two seats of Government; now, which is the one that will have a legal operation, as it respects those who are to transact business at the seat of Government? Here is nothing to restrain them in this instance more than in the other; so that his arguments apply with equal force against both permanent and temporary residence.

But he did not think the presence of the Legislature was an absolute condition of any place being the seat of Government. If that doctrine was true, this city would, or would not, be the seat of Government, as Congress was in session or in recess. This was an idea teeming with inconveniences; he supposed the other construction the more rational, as that the seat of Government was determined by the residence of the Executive, the great officers of Government, the Judges, and the foreign Ministers, public archives, &c. The Legislature might find it convenient to sit at some other place, without obliging all the suite of the Government to remove with them. If this was the true construction, the majority of the Senate and House of Representatives would have it in their power to repeal the Judicial bill, or what amounted to the same thing, defeat its execution, independent of the power of the President, by removing from place to place, so that the Judges could not follow them to hold the Supreme Courts; or they might adjourn, and by their adjournment, annihilate the seat of Government, where only those courts could be held.

Mr. MADISON begged leave to explain. The gentleman last up had charged him with inconsistency, as it respected his former vote and present observations. He would insist that he might have voted in the manner expressed, and yet have been perfectly consistent; because, when an objectionable clause is under consideration, it comes proper for its opponents to agree to every thing they conceive to be an amendment, in order that if the proposition passes it may pass in the least imperfect form.

It has been said, that the Supreme Courts must be held at the seat of Government. True; but the Judges will know where they are to meet without this declaration; for the common acceptance of the word will lead them to hold the sitting of the court in the city of New York. He could not, as an American, with an eye to the American Constitution and the American language, separate the Legislative power from that of the Government; it appeared to him, to be the most essential part of any free Government, but much the most extensive and essential in the Government of the United States.

Mr. AMES was of opinion, with the gentleman from New York, (Mr. LAWRENCE,) that the objection went equally against the permanent and temporary residence of Congress; but he believed the gentleman from Virginia meant to confine himself to what he had stated, namely, that the measure was unconstitutional. He admired the abilities of the honorable gentleman, and doubted not but the Constitution was the better in consequence of those abilities having been employed in its formation; but he was not disposed to pay implicit deference to that gentleman's exposition of that instrument. There were but few on this floor who were in Convention, and who could say what was the intention with which every clause was inserted. He was content to take it as he found it; and could say with the gentleman, as an American, with an eye to that Constitution, the language of liberty in his mouth, and the love of it in his heart, he hoped it would never be considered, either within or without these walls, that the two Houses of Congress are the Government of the United States. He contemplated this Government as a Government of laws, and not of men. The makers of them could command nothing as to themselves; the Executive, with the Judges, were those who exercised the authority of the law, and to them the term most properly applied; but he would not descend minutely into this inquiry; he trusted the inconsistency of the idea was so apparent as to induce the gentleman to give it up.

He stated, that the seat of Government must depend upon the circumstances mentioned by the gentleman from New York, or upon a law. Without it was the case, that the seat of Government was fixed and known, how could the Supreme Courts be held? Or how could the electors of the President transmit their votes sealed to the seat of Government, as required by the Constitution?

Mr. Madison contended that the words in the Constitution, alluded to by the gentleman, supported his construction. It declared that the Electors should transmit their votes sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate; that the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the votes, &c. The Senate appear from this to be a part of the Government; and their residence, with that of the House of Representatives, is supposed to be the seat of Government.

He did not mean to insinuate, as the gentleman had seemed to suppose, that the two Houses of Congress were the Government; but that the Legislative powers of the two Houses formed a part of the Government of the United States.

Mr. Smith, of South Carolina, had attended to the arguments, and was clearly of opinion that the seat of Government ought to be fixed by law; that required the consent of the President, as well as of Congress; they alone were but one-third of the Government, and not even that complete, for the Executive held a qualified negative over their Legislative authority. He thought gentlemen ought to attend to the convenience and policy of the measure, for he was persuaded that it was perfectly Constitutional; and, in this point of view, they ought to consider the situation of foreign ministers and others, who might have business to transact with any branch of the Government.

Mr. Lee was convinced the clause was unconstitutional, but if it was not, it was unnecessary. The late Congress fixed this city the seat of Government of the United States; they appointed the present Government to meet here, and, by so doing, made it the seat of Government; it will retain this property until Congress shall adjourn to meet elsewhere, after which it loses it as a matter of course. Where, then, is the use of attempting to renew the establishment by law? It is not pretended that the law will prevent Congress from adjourning elsewhere; then what effect can it have in favor of the city it is intended to secure?

Mr. Jackson had been against the bill from the beginning, and had fairly and openly opposed it; but since it had been carried against him upon full debate, he would acquiesce in the decision of the House, conceiving it to be the voice of his country. He thought the present objection, as to its Constitutionality, not well founded; but if it is well founded, it went against the whole bill. It had been said the clause was unnecessary; he believed, if it did no good, it did no harm; and, as it was so far approved of, he would give it his vote.

Mr. Boudinot conceived the objection to be well founded; and expected, as it was running a risk of losing the whole bill, on account of a doubtful clause, the friends to the permanent seat would concur in striking it out.

Mr. Heister said, as there were doubts entertained of its Constitutionality, he would vote against the clause; moreover, New York was so uncentral, that he could not consider it as the proper place for even the temporary seat of Government.

The question on striking out the clause was put, and passed in the negative; twenty-three for, and twenty-nine against it.

Mr. Madison proposed to strike out the word "permanent" as unnecessary, and a term unknown to the Constitution.

The question being put thereon, it passed also in the negative—twenty-four for, and twenty-eight against it.

The bill was then agreed to, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow. After which the House adjourned.

Tuesday, September 22.

SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.

The engrossed bill to establish the seat of Government of the United States was read a third time; and the question was, Shall this bill pass?

Mr. Carroll said, he felt himself under peculiar circumstances on the decision of this important question. The House had determined that the permanent seat of the Government of the United States should be on the Susquehanna, in

Permanent Seat of Government.

[H. or R.]

Pennsylvania, and not in Maryland on the Potomac. It was his opinion that the last would have been most conducive to the interest of the Union; and the voice of the majority of this House is against it. The Susquehanna, said he, being the next object most likely to attain what I have laid down as the rule of my conduct on this occasion, and, at the same time, must be agreeable to the wishes of a great part of my constituents, I felt myself under an obligation to vote for the Susquehanna, upon obtaining the clause which made it obligatory upon the States of Maryland and Pennsylvania to concur in opening the navigation of that river; and nothing would restrain me from giving my assent to the bill, but that clause which requires the concurrence of the President respecting the seat of Government, until Congress meet at their permanent seat. To this clause I have strong Constitutional objections; they were yesterday fully stated to this House by other gentlemen.

I have endeavored to remove this conviction from my mind, in order to give my assent to the bill; but as I am under the sacred obligation of an oath to support the Constitution, as I cannot efface the conviction from my mind that it is contrary to the Constitution, and as we could not succeed in striking out the clause, I feel myself under the disagreeable necessity of giving my dissent to the bill.

The yeas and nays, on passing the bill, being required by one fifth of the members present, were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Baldwin, Benson, Clymer, Contee, Fitzsimons, Floyd, Foster, Gale, Gilman, Goodhue, Grout, Hartley, Hathorn, Jackson, Lawrence, Leonard, Livermore, Muhlenberg, Partridge, Van Rensselaer, Scott, Seney, Sherman, Sylvester, Smith, (of Maryland,) Stone, Thatcher Trumbull, Wadsworth, and Wynkoop—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Bland, Boudinot, Burke, Cadwalader, Carroll, Coles, Lee, Madison, Matthews, Moore, Parker, Schureman, Smith, (of South Carolina,) Sumter, Tucker, Vining, and White—17.

The bill having passed, was sent to the Senate for their concurrence.

The bill to alter the time for the annual meeting of Congress was read the second time, and ordered to be referred to a committee of the whole House this day.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to recognise and adapt to the Constitution of the United States the establishment of the troops raised under the resolves of the United States in Congress assembled, Mr. Boudinot in the Chair; and, after some time spent in considering the same, the committee rose and reported that they had the said bill under consideration and made several amendments thereto, which were twice read and agreed to by the House.

It was then ordered that the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate was received, informing the House, that they had agreed to the order passed in this House this morning, rescinding the order of the 25th of August, for the adjournment of both Houses on this day; and directing that the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House do close the present session, by adjourning their respective Houses on the 26th instant.

It was ordered, that leave be given to bring in a bill to explain and amend the act for registering and clearing vessels, and regulating the coasting trade; Messrs. Bland, Benson, and Goodhue, were appointed to prepare and bring in the same. Adjourned.

Wednesday, September 23.

The engrossed bill for recognising and adapting to the Constitution of the United States the establishment of the troops raised under the resolves of the United States in Congress assembled, was read the third time and passed the House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making appropriations for the service of the present year, Mr. Boudinot in the Chair; and after some time spent in considering the same, the committee rose and reported that they had, according to order, had the said bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto; which being twice read, was agreed to by the House; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed, with the amendment, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. Bland, from the committee appointed for the purpose, presented a bill to explain and amend the act for registering and clearing vessels and regulating the coasting trade, which was read the first and second time, and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to alter the time for the annual meeting of Congress, Mr. Boudinot in the Chair; and after some time being spent in considering the same, the committee reported that they had had the said bill under consideration, gone through the same, and made several amendments thereto; which were twice read, and agreed to by the House.

The said bill, with the amendments, were ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the bill to regulate processes in the courts of the United States, Mr. Boudinot in the Chair; and after some time spent therein, the committee rose and reported progress. Adjourned.

Thursday, September 24.

The two following engrossed bills were read the third time and passed, to wit: the bill to explain and amend an act for registering and clearing vessels, and regulating the coasting trade, and the bill to alter the time for the annual meeting of Congress.

Amendments to the Constitution—Invalid Pensions.

[SEPTEMBER, 1789.]

The engrossed bill making appropriations for the service of the present year, being read the third time, was ordered to be recommitted to a Committee of the whole House this day.

A committee was appointed to ascertain the amount of the compensations due to the members of this House respectively, and of the contingent expenses thereof, together with the contingent expenses of the session; consisting of Messrs. FITZSIMONS, SMITH, (of Maryland,) and BALDWIN.

Mr. GERRY, from the committee to whom it was referred to prepare an estimate of the gross amount and net produce of the Impost and Tonnage duties for one year, made a report, which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The House proceeded to consider the report of a Committee of Conference, on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses to the several articles of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as proposed by this House: whereupon, it was resolved, that they recede from their disagreement to all the amendments; provided that the two articles, which, by the amendments of the Senate, are now proposed to be inserted as the third and eighth articles, shall be amended to read as follows:—

Art. 3. Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting a free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Art. 8. In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law; and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation—to be confronted with the witnesses against him—to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence.

And provided, also, that the first article be amended, by striking out the word "less" in the last place of the said article, and inserting, in lieu thereof, "more?"

On the question that the House agree to the alteration of the eighth article, in the manner aforesaid, the yeas and nays were called, and are as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Baldwin, Benson, Boudinot, Brown, Cadwalader, Carroll, Clymer, Contee, Fitzsimons, Foster, Gale, Gilman, Goodhue, Griffin, Hartley, Lee, Leonard, Madison, Moore, Muhlenberg, Parker, Partridge, Schureman, Scott, Seney, Sherman, Sylvester, Simeon, Smith, (of Maryland,) Smith, (of South Carolina,) Stone, Thatcher, Trumbull, Vinin, White, and Wynkoop—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Bland, Burke, Coles, Floyd, Gerry, Grout, Hathorn, Jackson, Livermore, Matthews, Page, Van Rensselaer, Sumter, and Tucker—14.

On motion, it was resolved, that the President of the United States be requested to transmit to the Executives of the several States which have ratified the Constitution, copies of the amendments proposed by Congress, to be added thereto, and like copies to the Executives of the States of Rhode Island and North Carolina.

INVALID PENSIONERS.

The House then went into a Committee on the bill making provision for the invalid pensioners; which, after being read over in committee, they rose and reported it; and it was recommitted to a select committee consisting of Messrs. WADSWORTH, HEISTER, and GILMAN.

The House, according to the order of the day, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill sent from the Senate, for regulating proceedings in the courts of the United States. Mr. Boudinot in the Chair; after some time spent in considering the bill, with amendments.

The first amendment was to strike out the words "the President thereof," in the first clause; which declared, that "all writs or processes, issuing out of the Supreme or Circuit Courts, should be in the name of the President of the United States," so as to allow writs and processes to issue only in the name of the United States. On agreeing to the motion for striking out these words, the yeas and nays were called, and are as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bland, Burke, Coles, Contee, Floyd, Gerry, Griffin, Grout, Hartley, Hathorn, Heister, Jackson, Lee, Livermore, Madison, Matthews, Moore, Muhlenberg, Parker, Scott, Seney, Stone, Sumter, Tucker, and White—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Baldwin, Benson, Clymer, Fitzsimons, Foster, Gale, Gilman, Goodhue, Lawrence, Leonard, Partridge, Sherman, Sylvester, Simeon, Thatcher, Vinin, and Wynkoop—18.

So the words were struck out.

The bill, as amended, passed the House, and was sent to the Senate; after which the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, September 25.

The appropriation bill was read a third time and passed.

DAY OF THANKSGIVING.

Mr. Boudinot said, he could not think of letting the session pass over without offering an opportunity to all the citizens of the United States of joining, with one voice, in returning to Almighty God their sincere thanks for the many blessings he had poured down upon them. With this view, therefore, he would move the following resolution:

Resolved, That a joint committee of both Houses be directed to wait upon the President of the United States, to request that he would recommend to the people of the United States a day of public thanksgiving and prayer, to be observed by acknowledging, with grateful hearts, the many signal favors of Almighty God, especially by affording them an opportunity peaceably to establish a Constitution of government for their safety and happiness.

Invalid Pensions—Regulating Process.

[H. or R.]

Mr. BROWN did not like this mimicking of European customs, where they made a mere mockery of thanksgivings. Two parties at war frequently sang Te Deum for the same event, though to one it was a victory, and to the other a defeat.

Mr. Boudinot was sorry to hear arguments drawn from the abuse of a good thing against the use of it. He hoped no gentleman would make a serious opposition to a measure both prudent and just.

Mr. TUCKER thought the House had no business to interfere in a matter which did not concern them. Why should the President direct the people to do what, perhaps, they have no mind to do? They may not be inclined to return thanks for a Constitution until they have experienced that it promotes their safety and happiness. We do not yet know but they may have reason to be dissatisfied with the effects it has already produced; but whether this be so or not, it is a business with which Congress have nothing to do; it is a religious matter, and, as such, is proscribed to us. If a day of thanksgiving must take place, let it be done by the authority of the several States; they know best what reason their constituents have to be pleased with the establishment of this Constitution.

Mr. SHERMAN justified the practice of thanksgiving, on any signal event, not only as a laudable one in itself, but as warranted by a number of precedents in Holy Writ: for instance, the solemn thanksgivings and rejoicings which took place in the time of Solomon, after the building of the temple, was a case in point. This example, he thought, worthy of Christian imitation on the present occasion; and he would agree with the gentleman who moved the resolution.

Mr. Boudinot quoted further precedents from the practice of the late Congress; and hoped the motion would meet a ready acquiescence.

The question was now put on the resolution, and it was carried in the affirmative: and Messrs. Boudinot, SHERMAN, and SYLVESTER, were appointed a committee on the part of the House.

INVALID PENSIONERS.

The Invalid Pensioners' bill was amended, and ordered to be engrossed, and afterwards passed its third reading.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee to whom such of the petitions, presented during the present session, as state any claims against the United States, or pray for the liquidation of any account, were referred, made report:

Whereupon, Resolved, That the several petitions of Dudley Tyler, I. Hurst, H. Malcom, P. Bennet, C. Merkle, A. Powar, and I. McGarragh, be referred to the Secretary of the Department of War, and that he report thereupon to the next session of Congress: That the memorial of Baron de Steuben, and the several petitions of Duncan Campbell, Thomasin Gordon, Monsieur Lejeune, Englebert Kemmena, Tristram Coffin, and Martha Walker, be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, to report thereupon, in like manner, to the next session of Congress.

gress; and that the case of Brigadier General Reed ought to be provided for by a general law concerning invalids.

It was then ordered by the House, that the committee to whom were referred the several petitions of William Finnie, James Gibbon, and Archibald McCallister, be discharged therefrom; and that the first be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury to examine, and report to the next session of Congress; and to the Secretary at War, to examine and report in the like manner upon the two latter.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate agree to the amendments proposed by this House to their amendments to the several articles of amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

FOR REGULATING PROCESS.

Another message was shortly after received from the Senate, informing the House that the Senate agree to all the amendments proposed by the House to the bill for regulating processes in the courts of the United States, except that respecting the style of the writ.

Mr. STONE hoped the House would insist upon their amendment. He thought substituting the name of the President, instead of the name of the United States, was a declaration that the sovereign authority was vested in the Executive. He did not believe this to be the case. The United States were sovereign; they acted by an agency, but could remove such agency without impairing their own capacity to act. He did not fear the loss of liberty by this single mark of power; but he apprehended that an aggregate, formed of one inconsiderable power, and another inconsiderable authority, might, in time, lay a foundation for pretensions it would be troublesome to dispute, and difficult to get rid of. A little prior caution was better than much future remedy.

The question was taken on their adherence to the amendment, which was decided in the affirmative; and the yeas and nays being called, were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bland, Boudinot, Brown, Burke, Carroll, Coles, Contee, Floyd, Gerry, Grout, Hartley, Hathorn, Heister, Jackson, Lee, Livermore, Madison, Matthews, Moore, Muhlenberg, Page, Parker, Van Rensselaer, Seney, Stone, Sumter, Tucker, and White—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Benson, Cadwalader, Clymer, Fitzsimons, Foster, Gale, Gilman, Goodhue, Lawrence, Leonard, Partridge, Schureman, Scott, Sherman, Sylvester, Simeon, Thatcher, Trumbull, Vinin, Wadsworth, and Wynkoop—22.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that they had passed the bill to alter the time for the next meeting of Congress.

SATURDAY, September 26.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate had agreed to a resolution that the late order for the adjournment of the two Houses this day be rescinded; and that the President of the Senate and the Speaker of this House be authorized to close the present session, by adjourning their respective Houses on Tuesday next; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The said resolution was read, and agreed to by the House.

A petition of Richard Ham, of the State of South Carolina, was presented to the House, and read, praying that he may receive compensation for certain services and supplies rendered for the use of the Navy of the United States, during the late war.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instructions to report thereupon to the next session of Congress.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate desired a conference with this House, on the subject-matter of the first amendment, depending between the two Houses, to the bill to regulate processes in the courts of the United States; and that they have appointed managers of the same on their part.

On motion, That this House do agree to the conference desired by the Senate; and that Messrs. WHITE, BURKE, and JACKSON, be appointed managers of the same on the part of this House.

DEBATES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. BURKE called up the following resolution, which he had laid on the table the 21st of this month:

Resolved. That the several persons who have published the debates of this House, in the Congressional Register, and in the newspapers of this city, have misrepresented these debates in the most glaring deviations from truth; often distorting the arguments of the members from the true meaning; imputing to some gentlemen arguments contradictory and foreign to the subject, and which were never advanced; to others, remarks and observations never made; and, in a great many instances, mutilating, and, not unfrequently, suppressing whole arguments upon subjects of the greatest moment; thus throwing over the whole proceedings a thick veil of misrepresentation and error; which being done within the House, at the very foot of the Speaker's chair, gives a sanction and authenticity to those publications, that reflects upon the House a ridicule and absurdity highly injurious to its privileges and dignity.

Resolved, That to misrepresent the debates of the House, whether it arises from incapacity, inattention, or partiality, has a mischievous tendency to infringe the freedom of debate, and that this House should no longer give sanction to it.

After the resolution was read, Mr. BURKE supported it by a reference to the misconceptions and blunders which had been printed. Mr. BLAND and Mr. WHITE made some observations on the subject, none of which, however, the editor had an opportunity of taking down.

Mr. STONE said, that there were undoubtedly inaccuracies published; but he was far from supposing this a solid reason for prohibiting the printing of their debates. He had the misfortune, he believed, not to be understood by some of those who attempted to detail what he said; because they had put into his mouth sentiments which his heart never felt, nor his head comprehended; but he should never think of suppressing what the world thought valuable information on this account. Speaking from his memory, and his own observations on the publications alluded to in the resolution, he was induced to say, that one of them was condemned in a degree beyond what he thought justice required. What he had mentioned of inaccuracies applied to the newspapers. The Congressional Register, he believed, was free from misrepresentations, other than sometimes changing the mode of expression or emphasis of language, which, he presumed was unavoidable, or necessary, when gentlemen delivered their sentiments on the floor, without system or grammatical precision. He did not pretend to assert further than for what he had spoken himself, that this work had some merit on account of its accuracy. He hoped, therefore, that the motion would not be agreed to.

Mr. GERRY said, these publications had a tendency to exalt some members and to depress others. Whence it arose that this was the case he did not pretend to say. He would exercise charity in this regard, and suppose it arose from inability or inadvertency in the reporters. But there was one thing very remarkable, that all the arguments on one side were fully stated, and generally took up some columns in the newspapers; while the arguments of the other side were partially stated, and condensed to a few solitary lines. Now, this circumstance could not proceed from the arguments not being heard, because gentlemen on the one side generally spoke as low as the gentlemen on the other; but, from whatever cause it proceeded, it had a tendency to hold one part up in a ridiculous point of view. If it was necessary to amuse the public in this way, to be sure they must submit to it; but he could not believe it necessary. He thought some regard ought to be paid to the reputation of the speakers, as it might influence that quality abroad; for he believed the debates of the House were neither confined to this city nor the United States.

He had made an observation, that the printers had it in their power, by misrepresentation, to make whom they pleased ridiculous in the eyes of the world, or to exalt those whose sentiments they favored. Viewing the publications in this point of light, they were conducted on principles of party, they might be one of the most dangerous engines in the hands of faction, and have a malignant and mischievous tendency upon the public voice of America. The debates of the British Parliament are published, it is true; they never permit them to be taken down, they never give serious consequences resulting from an improper use of such a liberty. But, notwithstanding all this, he was in favor of disseminating useful information, by a correct and impartial publication of the speeches.

Mr. PAGE moved to let the motion lie on the

SEPTEMBER, 1789.]

Permanent Seat of Government.

[H. OF R.]

table. He should object to driving the gentlemen who were at the foot of the Speaker's chair into the gallery. He looked upon such a measure as the first step towards driving them and all their hearers out of the House. It was well known to gentlemen, that they were admitted by the tacit consent of the members, and he would not acquiesce in a violent removal. He thought those gentlemen, who had reason to complain that they were held up in a ridiculous light by the printers, had now sufficient revenge by the severity of the motion, and he hoped it might induce more accurate and impartial sketches of the debates in future, to the full satisfaction of those gentlemen. But he would rather submit to all the inconveniences of ridicule than sacrifice what he thought a valuable publication of useful and interesting information to his constituents.

Mr. BURKE did not wish to draw the House into a tedious debate; sooner than be the occasion of it at this time, he would withdraw the motion. But he did not approve of sacrificing the honor and dignity of the House, by putting it into the power of the printers, as it were, by their sanction. The publication of the debates of the British Parliament was not authorized by that body; they were published by men who got access to their galleries. So here, he would be content if they were taken in the same way; but he did not like that the world should suppose these publications were authorized by the House. In truth, the misrepresentation he complained of was principally occasioned by the partiality of the printer who sat at the foot of the chair, in his publications on the most important questions that had been brought forward. He did not see him there now; but if he saw him there again, and he continued to print falsely what was said by gentlemen on this floor, he would renew the motion, which he now withdrew.

Mr. HARTLEY wished a decision on the motion. He contemplated the question as involving in it an attack upon the liberty of the press.

Mr. SUMNER.—As the motion was withdrawn, he would not speak upon it; but if a motion were made to authorize the publication of the debates, in an able and impartial manner, by a gentleman who was thought qualified for the purpose, he would give it his support.

Mr. GERRY held a wish of the same nature; for he was a friend to a fair and impartial publication.

Mr. TUCKER said, that he thought a motion of the following import might be adopted: That every person who was permitted to take down the debates ought to do it, to the best of his ability, in an accurate and impartial manner.

Mr. BLAND held a similar sentiment.

Mr. LEE thought there was an impropriety in admitting short-hand writers to publish the debates, by the declared authority of the House; but he was far from objecting to their publishing, as they had heretofore done, by their tacit consent.

Mr. MADISON thought it improper to throw impediments in the way of such information as the House had hitherto permitted from the purest motives; but he believed it equally improper to give the publication of their debates a legislative sanction, because it would be making the speakers, in some instances where they were misunderstood, answerable for the sentiments they never entertained. He had seen in the newspapers very great misconceptions of what fell from him; but he had no reason to believe it was done in order to cast a veil over his declarations, or to pervert them, with an intention of rendering him ridiculous. He believed the same was just as it applied to the speeches of other gentlemen. But, be this as it might, it gave him no concern, because he was not responsible for what was published, as it was done without his interference. If any thing was done in this matter, which tended to give a sanction to any publication, he presumed the members must be, individually, at the trouble of correcting and revising their speeches. This was an inconvenience he did not wish to encounter; he therefore concluded it best to leave it on its present footing.

Mr. WHITE disapproved the idea of giving a sanction to the publications by any vote whatever; but he was friendly to the practice of publishing the debates, because it conveyed useful information, and gave much satisfaction to those citizens who cannot attend in the galleries to hear the sentiments of those who represent them.

Mr. TUCKER withdrew the motion he had suggested, with a hope that the printers would be more cautious in future in their publications, and study a greater degree of accuracy and impartiality.

SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.

A message from the Senate was received, informing the House that they had passed the bill for establishing the seat of Government of the United States, with an amendment, which the House immediately took into consideration.

The amendment went to strike out all that related to the river Susquehanna, both as to fixing the seat of Government there, and removing the obstructions to the navigation; and to insert, in lieu thereof, "a district of ten miles square, bounded on the south by a line running parallel at one mile's distance from the city of Philadelphia, on the east side of the river of Delaware, and extending northerly and westerly, so as to include Germantown."

Mr. BLAND thought the bill was so materially changed as to warrant the House to postpone its consideration. The principles upon which the Senate had proceeded, he believed, had not yet been discussed in the House, and the short time which now remained of the session forbade the attempt.

Mr. PAGE seconded this motion. Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, hoped that gentlemen would agree to let the bill lie on the table, and not be driven into a measure which they considered injurious to the public interest. He trusted they would not be influenced to adopt this bill by the Senate's keeping the appropriation bill as a hostage for it, which he understood to be the case. Mr. FITZSIMONS was sorry to hear a thing of that kind insinuated against so respectable a body. He trusted the gentleman had been misinformed, but should be glad to know his authority. Mr. PARTRIDGE declared that a knowledge of this fact would have considerable influence on his conduct; therefore, he was desirous of knowing to what an extent it was a certainty.

Mr. BLAND would not charge the Senate with retaining the appropriation bill as a hostage; but he thought it of more importance than the bill they had now sent down, and wished it had been first acted upon.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that the appropriation bill was sent only yesterday to the Senate.

Mr. STONE did not suspect the Senate of the conduct which had been intimated; but, nevertheless, he was in favor of the postponement.

Mr. LEE remarked that the great principles which this House had adopted, on fall debate, were now thrown out of view; they had nothing to do with the amendment which the Senate had made. He could not, after this circumstance, bring himself to believe that the House would agree to the alteration, without discussing the other principles upon which it must be founded. And here the approaching termination of the session, and the quantity of unfinished business, presented to the mind a strong objection; either it could not be done at all, or done to great disadvantage. Beside, if it is laid over to the next session, the voice of the people may be better understood on this important question; when that was fully and fairly expressed, he flattered himself with an harmonious determination, to which all parties would submit without a single murmur.

Mr. SHERMAN thought the amendment of the Senate founded in wisdom, and upon true principles; the House had now nothing else before them. Indeed, they had just been spending an hour or two upon a very uninteresting subject respecting printers; he therefore trusted they would proceed to consider the amendment fully, and come in a proper time to a decision upon it.

Mr. WHITE considered the amendment of the Senate as totally changing the tenor of the bill, and therefore it was like introducing a new subject. Indeed, in all the long arguments which the question had drawn out, he believed this place had never been mentioned. The gentleman last up said there was no business before the House at present; but he would ask, if a business had never yet been before them, whether a member would be permitted to bring it forward at this late hour? He might be told that the act of the Senate carried greater weight in it than the motion of a member. But he would place against that weight the weight of the vote of this House, which on a former day agreed to fix the seat of Government on the banks of the Susquehanna; so that the question may be supposed to stand on independent ground.

But there was a collateral observation he would make. If Germantown was the proper place for the permanent residence of Congress, it was so near Philadelphia as to prove that that city would be the proper place for the temporary residence, and of course they ought to move there immediately, and order the next session to be held there; but both these questions were of too much moment to be fixed by a hasty vote of the House.

Mr. JACKSON had given his assent to the bill as it passed the House, after a fair opposition. He was satisfied his fellow-citizens would submit to what appeared to be the voice of their country; though they would have preferred the Potomac on account of its centrality and contiguity to the Western territory, yet he acceded to the Susquehanna; but this was no reason he should vote for Germantown. Who are those that say to us Germantown is the most proper spot that can be selected? They are the representatives of the State sovereignties; where the large and small States are equally represented, the voice of the majority of the people is lost in the inequality of the political branch of the Legislature. He could not but think an alteration in the sentiment of the House, on the ground, would excite serious alarm in the minds of the people; to avoid which consequence he should agree to the postponement.

Mr. GERRY urged as a reason for postponement, that North Carolina and Rhode Island were out of the Union at present; and that, as there was a flattering expectation that at least one of those States would adopt the Constitution by the next session, it would be extremely desirable to have their voice in determining this great question.

Mr. MADISON.—However different our sentiments with respect to the place most proper for the seat of the Federal Government, I presume we shall all agree that a right decision is of great importance; and that a satisfactory decision is of equal moment to the happiness and tranquillity of the Union: that even such decision may take place, are worthy of serious consideration.

Now, sir, the amendment proposed by the Senate not only deserves the name of a new bill, but it proceeds on principles different from those which served for the basis of the bill sent up to them from this House: hence, I presume, sir, it is not only necessary to examine the merits of the proposition, but to enter into a full and minute investigation of those principles upon which it is founded: the proposition is new, and in some degree opposed to what has heretofore prevailed: the public mind has not yet been called to the consideration of it; nay, I believe it never yet has been contemplated by the inhabitants of any one State: the eye of America should be indulged with an opportunity of viewing it before it be made their fixed abode. All the other places which have been mentioned as candidates for the seat of Government, on this occasion, have at different times, and in different forms, been held up to the public attention; two of them had not only employed the deliberation, but had obtained the favorable decision of the old Congress; now, after all this, to take up and adopt, in a moment, a rival place, never before contemplated, is risking an improper and a dissatisfactory decision.

Mr. STONE reminded the House of the majority there was in selecting the Susquehanna, which he conceived to be the second best spot in the United States; and how much greater that majority would have been than 31 to 17, if no other question had been involved in the bill: he could hardly suppose such a change of sentiment would take place without argument, as was necessary in order to get the Senate's amendment adopted, which, he understood, was carried by a small majority indeed.

Mr. WHITE would just add one observation, which was respecting the enormous price of land in the vicinity of Philadelphia; and how imprudent it would be for Congress to subject themselves to an exorbitant demand of this nature, by fixing upon the precise spot where this Federal town should be.

The question was now taken on postponing the consideration of the amendment proposed by the Senate, until the next session; and the yeas and nays being called, were:

YEAS.—Messrs. Baldwin, Bland, Brown, Burke, Carroll, Coles, Contee, Gale, Gerry, Griffin, Jackson, Lee, Madison, Matthews, Moore, Page, Parker, Schureman, Sney, Smith, of Maryland, Smith, of South Carolina, Stone, Sumter, Tucker, and White—25.

NAYS.—Messrs. Ames, Benson, Boudinot, Cadwalader, Clymer, Fitzsimons, Floyd, Foster, Gilman, Goodhue, Grout, Hartley, Hathorn, Heister, Lawrence, Leonard, Livermore, Muhlenberg, Partridge, Van Rensselaer, Scott, Sherman, Sylvester, Sinnickson, Thatcher, Turnbull, Vining, Wadsworth, and Wynkoop—29.

So it was determined in the negative.

A Message from the President of the United States was received, enclosing a letter from the Governor of Rhode Island, written at the request and in behalf of the General Assembly of that State; which being read, was ordered to lie on the table. And then the House adjourned.

MONDAY, September 28.

DAY OF THANKSGIVING.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they had agreed to the resolution desiring the President of the United States to recommend a day of general thanksgiving; also, to the resolution desiring him to transmit to the Executive of the several States of the Union, and also to the North Carolina, copies of the amendments agreed to by Congress, to the Constitution of the United States. They have also come to a resolution appointing a committee to join with such committee as this House shall appoint, to wait upon the President of the United States, and notify him of the proposed recess of Congress.

Whereupon, the House ordered that a committee be appointed to join with the committee of the Senate, for the purpose expressed in the last resolution; and named Messrs. Vining, LEE, and GILMAN, accordingly.

The House then proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill for the establishing the seat of Government of the United States.

SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.

Mr. SHERMAN.—In our deliberations on this occasion, we should have an eye to the general accommodation of the Union, and the best way of defraying the expense. The place fixed upon by the Senate, he presumed, was known to the members generally; hence they were able to judge of its eligibility at the first view; it certainly possessed some advantages over the other situation; and he believed it was as central, if not more so than the Susquehanna, as it respected the present inhabitants; the air, the soil, in that neighborhood, were quite as agreeable as the other. But there was an access by water, from every part of the United States, which furnished a very great convenience; but besides this, those who came from the Southern States had generally an inland navigation, with a short distance to come by land from the head of the Elk; so the citizens of the Eastern States, in like manner, would be accommodated by coming through the Sound, and crossing to Amboy, on which route they would have but about seventy miles land carriage; a distance nearly equal with the other. He admitted that Germantown was not quite so near to the Western territory as the Susquehanna was; but he contemplated a very distant day before it would be settled, and much longer before the inhabitants would have frequent occasion of travelling to the seat of Government. Added to the advantages he had mentioned, there were good buildings, and convenience for arsenals and ship yards, with abundance of artificers on the spot; these considerations, taken together, induced him to think it best to concur with the Senate.

With respect to the change which the Senate has proposed in the mode of obtaining the money requisite to defray the expense of raising the public buildings, he thought it a prudent alteration, considering the present situation of the Treasury; the Senate, no doubt, considered this circumstance, as well as that the State of Pennsylvania would be benefited by this selection, beyond her equal proportion; and that she ought, therefore, to contribute something for the advantage it procured her.

Mr. SMITH thought the honorable gentleman rather inconsistent in his argument to-day. If he recollected right, the gentleman had formerly urged in favor of the Susquehanna, that it was not accessible by vessels from sea; and now he recommends this quality as an advantage in favor of the Delaware. The gentleman admits that this position is not quite so near the Western Territory as the one chosen by the House; but then he thinks no inconvenience will arise, inasmuch as it will be some years before it is peopled; but how does this comport with the principle laid down by an almost unanimous vote of the House? At the beginning of this business, we declared that a due regard should be had to the Western Territory; he now tells us, as an argument in favor of the Senate's amendment, that we should have no regard to it at all. He thinks the change made in the manner of obtaining the money favorable; but what advantage will accrue to the United States from Pennsylvania's granting 100,000 dollars, when Congress will have to purchase the land on which they are to sit down? Land in the neighborhood of Philadelphia, he had been told, was worth 40 or 50 pounds an acre. The 100,000 dollars, given by Pennsylvania, would not go far in a purchase at this rate. He thought the Government would have a better bargain in buying cheap lands on the Susquehanna; or perhaps they might have been got there for nothing. He thought this alteration unfavorable to the Public Treasury, which could ill supply such a demand upon it.

But he had an objection which would go against fixing in the neighborhood of any large city. The Federal town would, in such case, be no more than a suburb. Could any one expect Germantown to rival Philadelphia? No; it would be swallowed up by it. The public ministers, and all the officers of Government, who could afford it, would reside in Philadelphia; for they are generally found to prefer a large, handsome, well-built city to a small village. Now, he would submit whether it was consistent with the dignity of the nation to place themselves in such a situation. Besides, the State of Pennsylvania had fixed boundaries, into which they would not admit Congress; should the House, then, to show their deference and respect to her, go precisely to those boundaries, and say they are content? Why, if Germantown is central, do we not say we will go to Philadelphia? that city would undoubtedly afford better accommodation, and could be but five miles short of the centre. No, we are not to go there, because the State of Pennsylvania has proscribed us; we must go to the very line she has marked out for us, and accept her cession upon her own terms. It would be more consistent with the dignity of Congress to select the place, and wait where we are well accommodated, till the State shall consent to give it.

He hoped the large majority which had agreed to the Susquehanna would continue firm, and not suffer a dereliction of the object they had so ably supported.

Mr. SHERMAN begged leave to answer a few words of the gentleman. He was charged with inconsistency, because he had said the Susquehanna was safe from vessels of war; but this was not an objection, in his mind, to any place; he only mentioned it to obviate the objection in the minds of those who entertained it: for his part, he did not fear the effects of an invasion, because he believed and trusted that many years would pass away before the United States were involved again in war. The gentleman might also remember that the Eastern members always thought the Susquehanna south and westward of the true centre, but were content to go that far for the sake of accommodation; but now that the Senate had agreed with them in that opinion, he thought it but reasonable to meet them, and adopt their proposition.

Mr. WHITTE had not been present when the question was discussed in this House; but he observed, from the minutes, and other publications, that the great contest lay between the Susquehanna and the Potomac: he understood that the interest of the whole was consulted in the choice the House had made; he was so far inclined to pay a deference to the opinion of this House, as to acquiesce in their decisions, although his own sentiments were in favor of the more southern and western position; but he could never think that great national principles would induce them to stop short of the place which they had approved.

Mr. MANISON contended that the amendment proposed by the Senate was a departure from every principle adopted by the House; but he would not trouble them with a recapitulation of arguments, which he feared would be unavailing; he wished, however, that the House would provide against one inconvenience, which was, to prevent the district in Pennsylvania, chosen by Congress, from being deprived for a time of the benefit of the laws. This, he apprehended, would be the case, unless Congress made provision for the operation of the laws of Pennsylvania, in the act by which they accepted of the cession of that State; for the State relinquished the right of legislation from the moment that Congress accepted of the district. The propriety of this proposition was so apparent, that he had not a doubt but the House would consent to it. He then moved the following proviso: "And provided, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect the operation of the laws of Pennsylvania, within the district ceded and accepted, until Congress shall otherwise provide by law."

Mr. LIVERMORE objected to this motion; because he supposed there was no necessity for it. The question was then taken, do the House agree to the amendment? and decided in the affirmative. The yeas and nays being demanded, are as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Cadwalader, Clymer, Fitzsimons, Floyd, Gerry, Gilman, Goodhue, Grout, Hartley, Hathorn, Heister, Huntington, Lawrence, Leonard, Livermore, Muhlenberg, Partridge, Van Rensselaer, Schureman, Scott, Sherman, Sylvester, Sinnenickson, Thatcher, Trumbull, Vining, Wadsworth, and Wynkoop—31.
NAYS—Messrs. Baldwin, Bland, Boudinot, Brown, Burke, Carroll, Coles, Contee, Griffin, Jackson, Lee, Madison, Matthews, Moore, Page, Parker, Seney, Smith, of Maryland, Smith of South Carolina, Stone, Sumter, Tucker, and White—24.

Mr. WHITTE reported that the committee of the House had conferred with the committee of the Senate, on the subject of writs issuing in the name of the President; but had come to no agreement.

A message from the Senate was then received, with the Process bill, to which an amendment was proposed by the Senate. The House then proceeded to consider the said amendment; and a motion being made to recede from their amendment, so far as to agree to the amendments of the said amendment proposed by the Senate, the yeas and nays being required, were:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Baldwin, Benson, Cadwalader, Carroll, Clymer, Fitzsimons, Foster, Gale, Gilman, Goodhue, Hardee, Lawrence, Lee, Leonard, Livermore, Partridge, Schureman, Scott, Sherman, Sylvester, Sinnenickson, Smith, of Maryland, Thatcher, Trumbull, and Wadsworth—25.

The votes being equal, it lay with the SPEAKER to decide, which he did in the affirmative.

A message was received from the Senate, with sundry amendments were proposed: the House immediately considered and agreed to the same. A message from the Senate was received, with the bill to explain and amend the act for registering and clearing vessels, with amendments; these amendments were agreed to by the House.

A further message was received, informing that the Senate had postponed the consideration of the amendment of the House to the act for establishing the seat of Government of the United States. Adjourned until this evening.

EODEM DIE.

A message was received from the Senate, informing the House that they had passed the act to recognise and adapt to the Constitution of the United States, the establishment of the troops raised under resolves of the old Congress, with amendments; which amendments were agreed to by the House; but when the last one was under consideration for striking out all that respected the number of the militia to be called into service for the defence of the frontiers, from the States of Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Georgia, and to insert a clause instead thereof, empowering the President to call out the militia generally, for the purpose of protecting the frontiers against the hostile invasion of the Indians, it was moved that the House disagree to the amendment of the Senate; and the yeas and nays being required, were:

YEAS—Messrs. Benson, Carroll, Clymer, Foster, Gilman, Lawrence, Lee, Madison, Partridge, Sherman, Sylvester, Smith, of Maryland, Stone, Thatcher, Trumbull, and Wadsworth—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Baldwin, Bland, Boudinot, Burke, Cadwalader, Coles, Contee, Fitzsimons, Floyd, Gerry, Heister, Jackson, Leonard, Livermore, Matthews, Moore, Muhlenberg, Van Rensselaer, Schureman, Scott, Seney, Sinnenickson, Sumter, Tucker, and White—25.

A number of engrossed bills, and the proposed amendments to the Constitution, were brought in.

passed, and signed: after which the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, September 29.

The two following Messages were received from the PRESIDENT:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

His Most Christian Majesty, by a letter dated the 7th of June last, addressed to the President and members of the General Congress of the United States of North America, announces the much lamented death of his son the Dauphin. The generous conduct of the French monarch and nation towards this country, renders every event that may affect his or their prosperity, interesting to us; and I shall take care to assure him of the sensibility with which a loss so much to be regretted must have occasioned both to him and them.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, Sept. 29, 1789.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

Having yesterday been informed, by a joint committee of both Houses of Congress, that they had agreed to a recess, to commence this day, and to continue until the first Monday in January next, I take the earliest opportunity of acquainting you that, considering how long and laborious this session has been, and the reasons which, I presume, have produced this resolution, it does not appear to me expedient to recommend any measures to their consideration at present.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, Sept. 29, 1789.

On motion of Mr. GERRY, it was ordered, that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House, at the end of each session, to send a printed copy of the Journals thereof, respectively, to the Supreme Executive, and each branch of the Legislature of every State.

A message was received from the Senate, with the resolution respecting John White; the bill for the establishment of troops; also a bill for allowing the Baron de Glaubeck the pay of a captain, to which they requested the concurrence of the House; this bill was thereupon read a first and second time, engrossed, and read a third time, enrolled and signed, and transmitted to the Senate.

And then it was ordered that a message be sent to the Senate, to inform them that this House, having completed the business before them, are now about to proceed to close the present session, by an adjournment on their part, agreeably to the order of the 26th instant; and that the Clerk of this House do go with the said message.

The Clerk accordingly went with the said message, and being returned, The SPEAKER adjourned the House until the first Monday in January next.

PROCEEDINGS

THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

AT THE SECOND SESSION OF THE FIRST CONGRESS, BEGUN AT THE CITY OF NEW YORK, JANUARY 4, 1790.

[That no debate appears in the proceedings of the Senate, is already accounted for in a note at the commencement of the Journal of the First Session. It is for this good reason, that, until its Session in 1794, the Senate sat with closed doors.]

MONDAY, January 4, 1790.

The following members of the Senate assembled:

From New Hampshire, JOHN LANGDON and PAINE WINGATE.

From Massachusetts, CALEB STRONG and THOMAS DALTON.

From Connecticut, WILLIAM S. JOHNSON.

From New York, RUFUS KING and PHILIP SCHUYLER.

From South Carolina, RALPH IZARD and PIERCE BUTLER.

From Georgia, WILLIAM FEW.

A quorum of members not being present, they adjourned till to-morrow.

TUESDAY, January 5.

JOHN HENRY, from Maryland, in addition to the members assembled yesterday, attended; but not being a quorum, they adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, January 6.

WILLIAM MACLAY, from Pennsylvania, attended; a quorum of the members of the Senate were present, and the Secretary was directed to inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate have assembled, and are ready to proceed to business.

Ordered, That Messrs. STRONG and IZARD be a committee on the part of the Senate, with such committee as the House of Representatives may appoint on their part, to inform the President of the United States that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and will be ready in the Senate Chamber, at such time as the President may appoint, to receive any communications they may be pleased to make.

THURSDAY, January 7.

OLIVER ELLSWORTH, of Connecticut, and WILLIAM PATERSON, from New Jersey, attended. *

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they have resolved that two Chaplains, of different denominations, be appointed to Congress for the present session, one by each House, who shall interchange weekly.

Mr. STRONG, on behalf of the joint committee, reported to the Senate, that they had waited on the President of the United States, agreeably to the order of both Houses, and that he informed the committee that he would meet the two Houses in the Senate Chamber to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolve of the House of Representatives, of this day, relative to the appointment of Chaplains; and,

Resolved, That the Senate concur therein; and that the Right Reverend Doctor SAMUEL PROVOOST be appointed for the present session, on the part of the Senate.

FRIDAY, January 8.

Ordered, That the House of Representatives be informed that the Senate are ready to meet them in the Senate Chamber, to receive any communication the President of the United States may be pleased to make to the two Houses of Congress; and that the usual seats will be assigned them.

The House of Representatives having accordingly taken their seats, the President of the UNITED STATES came into the Senate Chamber, and addressed both Houses of Congress, as follows:

Fellow-Citizens of the Senate, and House of Representatives:

I embrace with great satisfaction the opportunity which now presents itself of congratulating you on the present favorable prospects of our public affairs. The recent accession of the important State of North Carolina to the Constitution of the United States, (of which official information has been received;) the rising credit and respectability of our country; the general and increasing good-will towards the Government of the

[JANUARY, 1790.]

Union; and the concord, peace, and plenty, with which we are blessed, are circumstances auspicious in an eminent degree to our national prosperity.

In resuming your consultations for the general good, you cannot but derive encouragement from the reflection that the measures of the last session have been as satisfactory to your constituents, as the novelty and difficulty of the work allowed you to hope. Still further to realize their expectations, and to secure the blessings which a gracious Providence has placed within our reach, will, in the course of the present important session, call for the cool and deliberate exertion of your patriotism, firmness, and wisdom.

Among the many interesting objects which will engage your attention, that of providing for the common defence will merit particular regard. To be prepared for war, is one of the most effectual means of preserving peace.

A free people ought not only to be armed, but disciplined; to which end, a uniform and well-digested plan is requisite: and their safety and interest require that they should promote such manufactures as tend to render them independent of others for essential particularly military supplies.

The proper establishment of the troops which may be deemed indispensable, will be entitled to mature consideration. In the arrangements which may be made respecting it, it will be of importance to conciliate the comfortable support of the officers and soldiers, with a due regard to economy.

There was reason to hope that the pacific measures adopted with regard to certain hostile tribes of Indians, would have relieved the inhabitants of our Southern and Western frontiers from their depredations; but you will perceive, from the information contained in the papers which I shall direct to be laid before you, (comprehending a communication from the Commonwealth of Virginia,) that we ought to be prepared to afford protection to those parts of the Union, and, if necessary, to punish aggressors.

The interests of the United States require that our intercourse with other nations should be facilitated by such provisions as will enable me to fulfil my duty, in that respect, in the manner which circumstances may render most conducive to the public good; and to this end, that the compensations to be made to the persons who may be employed should, according to the nature of their appointments, be defined by law; and a competent fund designated for defraying the expenses incident to the conduct of our foreign affairs.

Various considerations also render it expedient that the terms on which foreigners may be admitted to the rights of citizens, should be speedily ascertained by a uniform rule of naturalization.

Uniformity in the currency, weights, and measures, of the United States, is an object of great importance, and will, I am persuaded, be daily attended to.

The advancement of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, by all proper means, will not, I trust, need recommendation; but I cannot forbear intimating to you the expediency of giving effectual encouragement, as well to the introduction of new and useful inventions from abroad, as to the exertions of skill and genius in producing them at home; and of facilitating the intercourse between the distant parts of our country by a due attention to the Post Office and post-roads.

Nor am I less persuaded that you will agree with me in opinion, that there is nothing which can better deserve your patronage than the promotion of science and literature. Knowledge is in every country the surest basis of public happiness. In one in which the measures of Government receive their impression so immediately from the sense of the community as in ours, it is proportionably essential. To the security of a free Constitution it contributes in various ways. By convincing those who are entrusted with the public administration, that every valuable end of Government is best answered by the enlightened confidence of the people, and by teaching the people themselves to know and to value their own rights, to discern and provide against invasions of them; to distinguish between oppression and the necessary exercise of lawful authority; between burdens proceeding from a disregard to their convenience, and those resulting from the inevitable exigencies of society; to discriminate the spirit of liberty from that of licentiousness, cherishing the first, avoiding the last, and uniting a speedy but temperate vigilance against encroachments, with an inviolable respect to the laws.

Whether this desirable object will be best promoted by affording aids to seminaries of learning already established, by the institution of a national university, or by any other expedients, will be well worthy of a place in the deliberations of the Legislature.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

I saw with peculiar pleasure, at the close of the last session, the resolution entered into by you, expressive of your opinion that an adequate provision for the support of the public credit is a matter of high importance to the national honor and prosperity. In this sentiment I entirely concur. And, to a perfect confidence in your best endeavors to devise such a provision as will be truly consistent with the end, I add an equal reliance on the cheerful co-operation of the other branch of the Legislature. It would be superfluous to specify inducements to a measure in which the character and permanent interests of the United States are so obviously and so deeply concerned, and which has received so explicit a sanction from your declaration.

Gentlemen of the Senate and House of Representatives:

I have directed the proper officers to lay before you, respectively, such papers and estimates as regard the affairs particularly recommended to your consideration, and necessary to convey to you that information of the state of the Union, which it is my duty to afford. The welfare of our country is the great object to which our cares and efforts ought to be directed. And I shall derive great satisfaction from a co-operation with you in the pleasing though arduous task of ensuring to our fellow-citizens the blessings which they have a right to expect from a free, efficient, and equal Government.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, January 8, 1790.

The President of the United States having retired, and the two Houses being separated:

Ordered, That Messrs. KING, IZARD, and PARSONS, be a committee to prepare and report the draft of an Address to the President of the United States, in answer to his Speech delivered this day to both Houses of Congress, in the Senate Chamber.

Ordered, That the Speech of the President of the United States delivered this day, be printed for the use of the Senate.

The Senate adjourned to Monday next.

[SENATE.]

MONDAY, January 11.

A Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, by Mr. LEAR, his Secretary, was read as follows:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

I have directed Mr. LEAR, my private Secretary, to lay before you a copy of the adoption and ratification of the Constitution of the United States by the State of North Carolina, together with a copy of a letter from his Excellency SAMUEL JOHNSON, President of the Convention of said State, to the President of the United States.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

The originals of the papers which are herewith transmitted to you will be lodged in the office of the Secretary of State.

UNITED STATES, January 11, 1790.

Ordered, That the Message from the President of the United States, with the papers accompanying the same, lie on the files of the Senate.

Mr. KING, on behalf of the committee, reported an Address to the President of the United States, in answer to his Speech to both Houses of Congress, which being amended, was adopted as follows:

To the President of the United States:

SIR: We, the Senate of the United States, return you our thanks for your Speech delivered to both Houses of Congress. The accession of the State of North Carolina to the Constitution of the United States gives us much pleasure; and we offer you our congratulations on that event, which at the same time adds strength to our Union, and affords a proof that the more the Constitution has been considered, the more the goodness of it has appeared. The information which we have received, that the measures of the last session have been as satisfactory to our constituents as we had reason to expect, from the difficulty of the work in which we were engaged, will afford us much consolation and encouragement in resuming our deliberations, in the present session, for the public good; and every exertion on our part shall be made to realize and secure to our country those blessings which a gracious Providence has placed within her reach. We are persuaded that one of the most effectual means of preserving peace is to be prepared for war; and our attention shall be directed to the objects of common defence, and to the adoption of such plans as shall appear the most likely to prevent our dependence on other countries for essential supplies. In the arrangements to be made respecting the establishment of such troops as may be deemed indispensable, we shall, with pleasure, provide for the comfortable support of the officers and soldiers, with a due regard to economy. We regret that the pacific measures adopted by Government, with regard to certain hostile tribes of Indians, have not been attended with the beneficial effects towards the inhabitants of our Southern and Western frontiers which we had reason to hope, and we shall cheerfully co-operate in providing the most effectual means for their protection, and, if necessary, for the punishment of aggressors. The uniformity of the currency, and of weights and measures; the introduction of new and useful inventions from abroad, and the exertions of skill and genius in producing them at home; the facilitating the communication between the distant parts of our country, by means of the post office and post roads; a provision for the support of the Department of Foreign Affairs, and a uniform rule of naturalization, by which foreigners may be admitted to the rights of citizens, are objects which shall receive such early attention as their respective importance requires. Literature and Science are essential to the preservation of a free Constitution: the measures of Government should, therefore, be calculated to strengthen the confidence that is due to that important truth. Agriculture, Commerce, and Manufactures, forming the basis of the wealth and strength of our confederated Republic, must be the frequent subject of our deliberation, and shall be advanced by all proper means in our power. Public Credit being an object of great importance, we shall cheerfully co-operate in all proper measures for its support. Proper attention shall be given to such papers and estimates as you may be pleased to lay before us. Our cares and efforts shall be directed to the welfare of our country; and we have the most perfect dependence upon your co-operating with us, on all occasions, in such measures as will insure to our fellow-citizens the blessings which they have a right to expect from a free, efficient, and equal Government.

The Senate then entered on Executive business, and the following Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES was read:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

Having advised with you upon the terms of a treaty to be offered to the Creek nation of Indians, I think it proper you should be informed of the result of that business, previous to its coming before you in your Legislative capacity. I have therefore directed the Secretary for the Department of War to lay before you my instructions to the Commissioners, and their report in consequence thereof.

The apparently critical state of the Southern frontier will render it expedient for me to communicate to both Houses of Congress, with other papers, the whole of the transactions relative to the Creeks, in order that they may be enabled to form a judgment of the measures which the case may require.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, January 11, 1790.

Ordered, That the Communication from the President of the United States be deferred for consideration.

TUESDAY, January 12.

A Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES was received by the Secretary of War:

Gentlemen of the Senate,

I lay before you a statement of the Southwestern frontiers, and of the Indian Department, which have been submitted to me by the Secretary for the Department of War.

I conceive, that an unreserved but confidential communication of all the papers relative to the recent negotiations with some of the Southern tribes of Indians is indispensably requisite for the information of Congress. I am persuaded, that they will effectually prevent either transcripts or publications of all such circumstances as might be injurious to the public interests.

On motion,

Resolved, That Messrs. ELLSWORTH, MACLAY, and HENRY, be a committee to confer with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to consider and report whether or not the business began previous to the late adjournment of Congress, shall now be proceeded in as if no adjournment had taken place.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the House of Representatives, acquainting them herewith, and requesting the appointment of a similar committee on their part.

THURSDAY, January 21.

ROBERT MORRIS, from Pennsylvania, attended. The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, by the Secretary of War:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and House of Representatives:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

You will perceive, from the papers herewith delivered, and which are enumerated in the annexed list, that a difference subsists between Great Britain and the United States, relative to the boundary line between our Eastern boundary and their territories. A plan for deciding this difference was laid before the late Congress; and whether that, or some other plan of a like kind, would not now be eligible, is submitted to your consideration. In my opinion, it is desirable that all questions between this and other nations be speedily and amicably settled; and in this instance I think it advisable to postpone any negotiations on the subject, until I shall be informed of the result of your deliberations, and receive your advice as to the propositions most proper to be offered on the part of the United States.

As I am taking measures for learning the intentions of Great Britain respecting the further detention of our posts, &c., I am the more solicitous that the business now submitted to you may be prepared for negotiation as soon as the other important affairs which engage your attention will permit.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee appointed July the 2d, on the motion "That provision shall be made the next session of Congress, for loaning to the United States a sum not exceeding twenty-two millions of dollars;" which report is in the words following:

Whereas, a provision for the debt of the respective States by the United States would be greatly conducive to an orderly, economical, and effectual arrangement of the public finances; would tend to an equal distribution of burdens among the citizens of the several States; would promote more general justice to the different classes of public creditors, and would serve to give stability to public credit: And whereas, the said debts having been essentially contracted in the prosecution of the late war, it is just that such provision should be made:

Resolved, That a loan be proposed, to the amount of twenty-one millions of dollars, and that subscriptions to the said loan be received at the same times and places, by the same persons, and upon the same terms, as in respect to the loan which may be proposed concerning the domestic debt of the United States, subject to the exceptions and qualifications hereafter mentioned. And that, the sums which shall be subscribed to the said loan shall be payable in the principal and interest of the certificates or notes, which, prior to the first day of January last, were issued by the respective States, as acknowledgments or evidences of debts by them respectively owing, and which shall appear, by oath or affirmation, (as the case may be,) to have been the property of an individual or individuals, or body politic, other than a State, on the said first day of January last. Provided, That no greater sum shall be received in the certificates of any State, than as follows, that is to say:

In those of New Hampshire,	$300,000
In those of Massachusetts,	4,000,000
In those of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations,	200,000
In those of Connecticut,	1,600,000
In those of New York,	1,200,000
In those of New Jersey,	800,000
In those of Pennsylvania,	2,200,000
In those of Delaware,	200,000
In those of Maryland,	800,000
In those of Virginia,	3,200,000
In those of North Carolina,	2,200,000
In those of South Carolina,	4,000,000
In those of Georgia,	300,000

And, Provided, That no such certificate shall be received, which, from the tenor thereof, or from any public record, act, or document, shall appear, or can be ascertained to have been issued for any purpose other than compensations and expenditures for services or supplies towards the prosecution of the late war, and the defence of the United States, or of some part thereof during the same.

Resolved, That the interest upon the certificates which shall be received in payment of the sums subscribed towards the said loan, shall be computed to the last day of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, inclusively; and the interest upon the stock, which shall be created by virtue of the said loan, shall commence or begin to accrue on the first day of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, and shall be payable quarterly yearly, at the same time, and in like manner, as the interest on the stock to be created by virtue of the loan that may be proposed in the domestic debt of the United States.

Resolved, That if the whole sum allowed to be subscribed in the debt or certificates of any State as aforesaid, shall not be subscribed within the time for that purpose limited, such State shall be entitled to receive, and shall receive from the United States, at the rate of four per centum per annum, upon so much of the said sum as shall not have been so subscribed, in trust for the non-subscribing creditors of such State, to be paid in like manner as the interest on the stock which may be created by virtue of the said loan, and to continue until there shall be a settlement of accounts between the United States and the individual States; and, in case a balance shall then appear in favor of such State, until provision shall be made for the said balance.

But as certain States have respectively issued their own certificates in exchange for those of the United States, whereby it might happen that interest might be twice payable on the same sum:

Resolved, That the payment of interest, whether to States or individuals, in respect to the debt of any State by which such exchange shall have been made, shall be suspended, until it shall appear, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury, that certificates issued for that purpose, by such State, have been re-exchanged or redeemed, or until those which shall not have been re-exchanged or redeemed shall be surrendered to the United States.

And it is further Resolved, That the faith of the United States be, and the same is hereby, pledged to make like provision for the payment of interest on the amount of the stock arising from subscriptions to the said loan, with the provision which shall be made touching the loan that may be proposed in the domestic debt of the United States; and so much of the debt of each State as shall be subscribed to the said loan, shall be a charge against such State in account with the United States.

It was agreed that the preamble should be postponed.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

In consequence of the general principles agreed to by the Senate in August, 1789, the adjustment of the terms of a treaty is far advanced between the United States and the Chiefs of the Creek Indians now in this city, in behalf of themselves and the whole Creek nation.

In preparing the articles of this treaty, the present arrangements of the trade with the Creeks have caused much embarrassment. It seems to be well ascertained, that the trade is almost exclusively in the hands of a company of British merchants, who, by agreement, make their importations of goods from England into the Spanish ports.

As the trade of the Indians is a main means of their political management, it is, therefore, obvious that the United States cannot possess any security for the performance of treaties with the Creeks, while their trade is liable to be interrupted, or withheld, at the caprice of two foreign Powers.

Hence it becomes an object of real importance to form new channels for the commerce of the Creeks through the United States. But this operation will require time, as the present arrangements cannot be suddenly broken without the greatest violation of faith and morals.

It therefore appears to be important to form a secret article of a treaty, similar to the one which accompanies this Message.

If the Senate should require any further explanation, the Secretary of War will attend them for that purpose.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, August 4th, 1790.

The President of the United States puts the following question for the consideration and advice of the Senate: If it should be found essential to a treaty for the firm establishment of peace with the Creek nation of Indians, that an article to the following effect should be inserted therein, will such an article be proper? viz:

SECRET ARTICLE.

The commerce necessary for the Creek nation shall be carried on through the ports, and by the citizens of the United States, if substantial and effectual arrangements shall be made for that purpose by the United States, on or before the 1st day of August, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two. In the mean time, the said commerce may be carried on through its present channels, and according to its present regulations.

And whereas the trade of the said Creek nation is now carried wholly, or principally, through the territories of Spain, and obstructions thereto may happen by war or prohibitions of the Spanish Government, it is therefore agreed between the said parties that, in the event of such obstructions happening, it shall be lawful for such persons as — shall designate, to introduce into, and transport through, the territories of the United States to the country of the said Creek nation, any quantity of goods, wares, and merchandise, not exceeding in value, in any one year, sixty thousand dollars, and that free from any duties or impositions whatsoever, but subject to such regulations for guarding against abuse, as the United States shall judge necessary; which privilege shall continue as long as such obstruction shall continue.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, August 4th, 1790.

The Senate proceeded to consider the Message from the President of the United States, of this day; whereupon,

Resolved, That the Senate do advise and consent to the execution of the secret article referred to in the Message, and that the blank in said article be filled with the words "President of the United States."

The Senate then entered on Executive business. The following Message from the President of the United States was read, as follows:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

Considering the circumstances which prevented the late Commissioners from concluding a peace with the Creek nation of Indians, it appeared to me most prudent that all subsequent measures for disposing them to a treaty should, in the first instance, be informal.

I informed you, on the 4th instant, that the adjustment of the terms of a treaty with their chiefs, now here, was far advanced. Such further progress has since been made, that I think measures may at present be taken for conducting and concluding that business in form. It therefore becomes necessary that a proper person be appointed and authorized to treat with them. For this purpose I nominate to you Henry Knox.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, August 5, 1790.

The Senate agreed to dispense with the rule, so far as to take into consideration the above Message at this time, and

The following Message was then received and read, from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

I lay before you a treaty between the United States and the Chiefs of the Creek nation, now in this city, in behalf of themselves and the whole Creek nation, subject to the ratification of the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate.

While I flatter myself that this treaty will be productive of present peace and prosperity to our Southern frontier, it is to be expected that it will also, in its consequences, be the means of firmly attaching the Creeks and the neighboring tribes to the interests of the United States.

At the same time, it is to be hoped that it will afford solid grounds of satisfaction to the State of Georgia, as it contains a regular, full, and definitive relinquishment, on the part of the Creek nation, of the Oconee land, in the utmost extent in which it has been claimed by that State, and thus extinguishes the principal cause of those hostilities from which it has more than once experienced such severe calamities.

But, although the most valuable of the disputed land is included, yet there is a certain claim of Georgia, arising out of the treaty made by that State at Galphinston, in November, 1765, of land to the eastward of a new temporary line from the forks of the Oconee and Ocmulgee, in a southwest direction, to the St. Mary's river, which tract of land the Creeks in this city absolutely refuse to yield.

This land is reported to be generally barren, sunken, and unfit for cultivation, except in some instances on the margin of the river, on which, by improvement, rice might be cultivated—its chief value depending on the timber fit for the building of ships, with which it is represented as abounding.

While it is thus circumstanced, on the one hand, it is stated by the Creeks on the other, to be of the highest importance to them, as constituting some of their most valuable winter hunting ground.

I have directed the Commissioner, to whom the charge of adjusting this treaty has been committed, to lay before you such papers and documents, and to communicate to you such information relative to it, as you may require.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, August 7th, 1790.

Ordered, That the Message, with the treaties therein referred to, be read, and that they lie for consideration.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they agree to the amendment of the Senate to the bill making certain appropriations therein mentioned.

The Senate then entered on Executive business; and the following Message was received and read from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

Although the treaty with the Creeks may be regarded as the main foundation of the future peace and prosperity of the Southwestern frontier of the United States, yet, in order fully to effect so desirable an object, the treaties which have been entered into with the other tribes in that quarter must be faithfully performed on our part.

During the last year, I laid before the Senate a particular statement of the case of the Cherokees. By a reference to that paper it will appear, that the United States formed a treaty with the Cherokees in November, 1785; that the said Cherokees thereby placed themselves under the protection of the United States, and had a boundary assigned them; that the white people settled on the frontiers had openly violated the said boundary, by intruding on the Indian lands; that the United States, in Congress assembled, did on the first day of September, 1788, issue their proclamation, forbidding all such unwarrantable intrusions, and enjoining all those who had settled upon the hunting grounds of the Cherokees to depart with their families and effects, without loss of time, as they would answer their disobedience to the injunctions and prohibitions expressed, at their peril.

But information has been received that, notwithstanding the said treaty and proclamation, upwards of five hundred families have settled on the Cherokee lands, exclusively of those settled between the forks of French Broad and Holstein rivers, mentioned in the said treaty.

As the obstructions to a proper conduct on this matter have been removed since it was mentioned to the Senate, on the 23d of August, 1789, by the accession of North Carolina to the present Union, and the cessation of the land in question, I shall conceive myself bound to exert the powers intrusted to me by the Constitution, in order to carry into faithful execution the treaty of Hopewell, unless it shall be thought proper to attempt to arrange a new boundary with the Cherokees, embracing the settlements, and compensating the Cherokees for the cessions they shall make on the occasion. On this point, therefore, I state the following questions, and request the advice of the Senate thereon:

1st. Is it the judgment of the Senate that overtures shall be made to the Cherokees to arrange a new boundary, so as to embrace the settlements made by the white people since the treaty of Hopewell, in November, 1785?

2d. If so, shall compensation to the amount of ——— dollars annually, or of ——— dollars in gross, be made to the Cherokees for the land they shall relinquish, holding the occupiers of the land accountable to the United States for its value?

3d. Shall the United States stipulate solemnly to guarantee the new boundary which may be arranged?

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, August 11, 1790.

Agreed, by unanimous consent, to proceed to the consideration of this Message. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the Senate do advise and consent that the President of the United States do, at his discretion, cause the treaty concluded at Hopewell with the Cherokee Indians, to be carried into execution, according to the terms thereof, or to enter into arrangements for such further cessions of territory from the said Cherokee Indians, as the tranquillity and interest of the United States may require; provided the sum which may be stipulated to be paid to the Cherokee Indians do not exceed one thousand dollars annually; and provided, further, that no person who shall have taken possession of any lands within territory assigned to the said Cherokee Indians, by the said treaty of Hopewell, shall be confirmed in any such possessions, but by a compliance with such terms as Congress may hereafter prescribe.

Resolved, In case a new, or other boundary than that stipulated by the treaty of Hopewell, shall be concluded with the Cherokee Indians, that the Senate do advise and consent solemnly to guarantee the same.

THURSDAY, August 12.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate, that the House of Representatives having finished the business before them, are about to adjourn, agreeably to the vote of the two Houses of Congress on Tuesday last.

On motion,

Resolved, unanimously, That the thanks of the Senate be given to the Corporation of the city of New York, for the elegant and convenient accommodations provided for Congress, and that a copy of this resolve be enclosed in the following letter from the VICE PRESIDENT:

Vice President of the United States, and President of the Senate.

tered into with the Chiefs of the Creek nation of Indians.

And, on the question to advise and consent to the ratification of the said treaty, made with the Creek nation, and referred to in the Message of the President of the United States, of the 7th of August, 1790; the yeas and nays were required by one-fifth of the Senators present, and were:

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives that the Senate, having finished the Legislative business before them, are about to adjourn, agreeably to the vote of both Houses of Congress of the 10th instant.

And the VICE PRESIDENT adjourned the Senate accordingly, to meet on the first Monday in December next.

Tuesday, January 5.

Mr. BOUDINOT took his seat. No quorum.

Wednesday, January 6.

Mr. SCHUREMAN, Mr. PAGE, and Mr. LEE, took their seats. No quorum.

Thursday, January 7.

JONATHAN STURGIS, and JEREMIAH WADSWORTH, from Connecticut, JEREMIAH VAN RENSSELAER, from New York, DANIEL CARROLL, from Maryland, and GEORGE MATHEWS, from Georgia, appearing and taking their seats, a quorum of the whole House was present; of which the Senate were informed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the 4th instant, requesting that when there shall be a sufficient number of the two Houses of Congress assembled to proceed to business he may be informed of it; and, also, at what time and place it will be convenient for Congress that he should meet them, in order to make some oral communications at the commencement of their session; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they had appointed a committee on their part, jointly with such committee as shall be appointed on the part of the House, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses had assembled, and will be ready, in the Senate Chamber, at such time as he shall appoint to receive any communications which he shall think proper to make.

Messrs. GILMAN, AMES, and SENEY, were then appointed a committee on the part of the House, for the purpose expressed in the message from the Senate.

It was then ordered that a committee be appointed to examine the Journal of the last session, and to report therefrom all such matters of business as were then depending and undetermined, and a committee was appointed, consisting of Messrs. BOUDINOT, SHERMAN, and WHITE.

Resolved, That two Chaplains, of different denominations, be appointed to Congress for the present session, one by each House, who shall interchange weekly.

Ordered, That the Clerk of the House do carry the said resolution to the Senate, and desire their concurrence.

Mr. GILMAN, from the committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, pursuant to the order of this day, reported that they had, according to order, performed that service, and that the President was pleased to say he would attend to make his communications to both Houses of Congress to-morrow morning, at 11 o'clock.

FRIDAY, January 8.

HENRY WYNEKOOP, from Pennsylvania, appeared, and took his seat.

The SPEAKER and the members present attended in the Senate Chamber, to receive the President of the United States, who addressed both Houses. [His Address will be found in the Proceedings of the Senate, page 932.]

The SPEAKER and the members of the House having returned from the Senate, a copy of the President's Speech was read, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on to-morrow.

The Journal was then read by the Clerk.

Mr. BOUNDINOR moved to correct the title by striking out all the words, after declaring it merely the Journal of the House of Representatives. He was seconded by Mr. BENSON.

Mr. PAGE opposed it, because the title of the Journal contained nothing more than the fact. It was denominated the Second Session of the First Congress under the Constitution of the Government of the United States, proposed September 17th, 1787, by the Convention in Philadelphia; and he called upon gentlemen to say, if this was more or less than the truth; besides, it was perfectly consonant with Parliamentary practice; if the last sitting of Congress, and the present were to be determined one session, then all business would proceed from the state in which it had been left last September; now this was contrary to the rule established by the Lex Parliamentaria, and might be productive of bad consequences. If the words are to be struck out, the natural implication will be, that the two sittings are but one session.

Mr. BOUNDINOR declared, he had no design of deciding the question alluded to by his honorable friend. It was merely to rid the Journal of words which appeared to him superfluous.

Mr. SHERMAN was in sentiment with the gentleman from New Jersey; he did not wish to give an opinion respecting the unfinished business of last session, but he thought the regulation on that head had better be established by a joint rule of both Houses.

Mr. TUCKER remarked, that the question "whether the business of last session was to be taken up de novo, or to be continued onward from the state in which it had been left, was not properly before the House, but the word session, in his opinion, ought to be preserved in the Journal, because its meaning was of some importance. He observed, that the Legislature of South Carolina was a biennial body, and that it was for some time a matter of uncertainty whether the session was not the term of two years for which the Senate and House of Representatives were elected, but the point had been determined, upon a law passed to continue for a term of years, and from thence to the end of the next session of the Legislature; the efficacy of this law depended upon the meaning of the word session, and the courts of judicature were of opinion that a session was from the time of meeting until the rising of the Legislature, and no longer.

He conceived the title to be of no importance in any other point of view, but in this it might, as Congress had already passed a law for a term expiring at the end of the next session, he, therefore, wished the word to be defined, and he imagined it would be done by retaining it in the place it stood.

After some further desultory conversation, the title of the Journal was established by a vote of the House, as follows:

JOURNAL OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES.

At a session of Congress of the United States, begun and held at the city of New York, on Monday, the 4th day of January, 1790, being the second session of the First Congress, held under the present Constitution of Government for the United States, being the day appointed by law for the meeting of the present session.

On the further reading of the Minutes, Mr. THATCHER observed, that a call of the House which had taken place at the meeting was not entered on the Journal.

Mr. PAGE was sorry to find any gentleman insist upon the entry of a measure which was not completed. He was concerned, likewise, that he had not been here to answer to his name, but he was delayed seven days by head winds, and two days by extreme badness of the roads. Under such circumstances, he thought the gentlemen who were so fortunate as to get here in time, deserved little more credit than those who were plunging at the risk of their lives through almost insuperable difficulties. He hoped it was not intended to stigmatize gentlemen who did not deserve it.

Mr. WHITE.—If the absentees were from the remote States, there would be some indelicacy in ordering a call of the House at so early a period of the session, because there might be natural unavoidable impediments to prevent their punctual attendance, but he had observed, that the absentees were mostly from the neighboring States, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania; and some of the members had declared they would not come until they were informed that there was a House. Now in order to make the Journal a true transcript of what had really passed in the House, it was necessary to have this call inserted; for the motion was regularly made, seconded, and carried; the absentees were noted.

and, after some time, they were called again, and those who were known to be sick, or on their way, were apologised for, and excused; here, indeed, the business terminated, and they were not ordered into the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms. After these remarks he concluded by saying, that he did not move to have it inserted on the Journal, and was unconcerned about it.

Mr. LAWRENCE hoped the call would not be entered on the Journal, if it was intended to reproach the conduct of the absent members, for he was very well satisfied in his own mind, that few, if any, of them were guilty of neglecting their duty.

Mr. WADSWORTH likewise hoped the entry would not be made. He had left home a week ago, but had been detained by head winds. He dared to say that this would be found to be the case with respect to a number of other gentlemen; and as far as his knowledge went with relation to such as were absent, it was on necessary occasions.

Mr. PARTRIDGE did not wish to stigmatize any gentleman by an entry of this kind on the Journals. He meant simply that the fact should appear as it really happened in the House; however, as the business had not been completed, he would withdraw his second to the motion for having the entry made.

Mr. PAGE said, no new stigma could be received by him or his colleague, (Mr. LEE.) By the entry on the Journals, it appeared they were not here on Monday or Tuesday, but on Wednesday it is said that John Page and R. B. Lee appeared, and took their seats; consequently, what he had said could not be construed to favor himself or his colleague, but it was generally for those who had not been able to get here so soon.

The motion for entering on the Journals the call of the House, was withdrawn.

The House then proceeded to the appointment of a Chaplain for the present session; and, after a previous nomination, the Rev. Mr. LYNN was duly chosen.

SATURDAY, January 9.

GEORGE CLYMER, from Pennsylvania, appeared, and took his seat.

SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY'S REPORT.

A letter from Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury, was read, informing the House that, agreeably to their resolution of the 21st of September, he had prepared a plan for the support of the Public Credit, and that he was ready to report the same to this House, when they should be pleased to receive it.

It was proposed that Thursday next be assigned for this purpose.

Mr. CLYMER wished to add to the motion, that it should be made in writing.

Mr. BOUNDINOR hoped that the Secretary of the Treasury might be permitted to make his report in person, in order to answer such inquiries as the members might be disposed to make, for it was a justifiable surmise that gentlemen would not be able clearly to comprehend so intricate a subject without oral illustration.

Mr. CLYMER expressed some doubts with respect to the propriety of receiving oral communications from the Head of such an important Department. He was rather inclined to think that such communications ought to be in writing.

Mr. AMES conceived it to be the duty of the House to obtain the best information on any subject; but on this very important one they ought to be particularly careful to get it from the highest source. The Secretary of the Treasury is a most important and responsible officer; the delicacy of his situation required every indulgence to be extended to him, that had a tendency to enable him to complete the arduous undertaking in which he was engaged. It would be a real misfortune that a salutary measure should be defeated for want of being understood; yet the most advantageous plans may miscarry in their passage through this House, by reason of their not being clearly comprehended. He hoped, therefore, that the financier would be authorized to make such communications and illustrations as he judged necessary; but he wished these communications to be in writing; in this shape they would obtain a degree of permanency favorable to the responsibility of the officer, while, at the same time, they would be less liable to be misunderstood.

Mr. BENSON observed, that the Secretary of the Treasury was directed, by a resolution of the last session, to prepare a plan for the support of public credit, and to report the same at this meeting. The point to be settled is, whether it shall be done by an oral communication, or transmitted in writing? In the former order of the House, this point was untouched, and the Secretary was left at his discretion to prepare himself for reporting in either way; consequently, when we have fixed the time for receiving his report, he may make it in the manner for which he is prepared; but, no doubt, this officer, actuated by motives of deference and respect, will conform to any rule the House may think proper to enact.

Mr. GERRY conceived it would be necessary the Secretary should be authorized, by a vote of the House, to give explanations to his plans. This, he was not expressly authorized to do by the vote of the last session, which confined him merely to prepare a plan for the support of the public credit. Would any gentleman on this floor suppose himself capable of comprehending and combining the parts of a general system, calculated to produce such a grand effect? In a plan for supporting public credit, may be comprehended every species of finance. The Secretary, under such an order, may propose an extension of your impost to entire new articles, an increase of some, and a diminution upon others. He may propose an introduction of a system of excise; with all these he may combine duties, stamps, and direct taxes. Can the human mind retain, with any great degree of precision, objects so extensive and multifarious upon a mere oral communication? This consideration alone ought to be sufficient to induce gentlemen to agree to his proposition of making the report in writing; but his proposition extended still further, it went to give him a right to lay before them his explanations, if he thinks explanations necessary.

On the question, the resolution for receiving the report of the Secretary of the Treasury in writing was carried in the affirmative.

PRESIDENT'S SPEECH.

On motion, the House now resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the President's Speech. Mr. BALDWIN in the Chair.

Mr. SMITH (of South Carolina) proposed a resolution that an Address be presented to the President in answer to his Speech to both Houses, assuring him that this House will, without delay, proceed to take into their serious consideration the various and important matters recommended to their attention.

Mr. WHITE thought this motion hardly sufficient; it was too general to warrant a select committee to draught that particular reply which he hoped the House was disposed to make to every part of the President's Speech; he therefore begged the gentleman to withdraw it, and permit him to substitute one in its stead, which he read in his place.

Mr. BOUDINOT thought the proposition just read by the honorable gentleman from Virginia much superior to that proposed by his worthy friend from South Carolina. It must have struck every gentleman that there were other matters contained in the Speech deserving of notice, besides those recommended to their serious consideration. There was information of the recent accession of the important State of North Carolina to the Constitution of the United States. This event ought to be recognised in a particular manner, according to its importance; and he presumed to think that its importance was of the very first magnitude.

A desultory conversation now took place on amending the original proposition in such a manner as to embrace generally the subjects of the Speech; when, at length, it was amended to read as follows:

Resolved, As the sense of this committee, that an Address be presented by the House to the President of the United States, in answer to his Speech to both Houses, with assurances that this House will, without delay, proceed to take into consideration the various and important matters recommended to their attention.

Whereupon, Messrs. SMITH, (of South Carolina,) CLYMER, and LAWRENCE, were appointed a committee to prepare the said Address.

MONDAY, January 11.

JONATHAN TRUMBULL, from Connecticut; JOHN HATHORN, from New York; and ANDREW MOORE, from Virginia, appeared, and took their seats.

UNFINISHED BUSINESS.

Mr. BOUDINOT, from the committee to whom it was referred to examine the Journal of the last session, and to report therefrom all such matters of business as were then depending and undetermined, reported that the committee have, according to order, examined the Journal, and agreed to the following report:

It appears to your committee, that the several petitions of David Ramsey, John Churchman, Alexander Lewis, Arthur Greer, Jedediah Morse, John Fitch, Englehart Cruise, Nicholas Pike, Samuel Briggs, John Christopher Stoebel, Leonard Harbaugh, Hannah Adams, Christopher Colles, David Greenleaf, John Macpherson, Abraham Westervelt, James Rumsey, and William Hoy, respectively, praying for exclusive privileges as authors or inventors of some useful work or discovery, were ordered to lie on the table, and so remained during the session.

It further appears to your committee, that the several petitions of Martha Walker, Duncan Campbell, Tristram Coffin, William Finnie, Englebert Kemmense, Thomasin Gordon, Prudent la Jenease, Baron de Steuben, and Richard Ham, respectively, praying to be compensated for military services, or for injuries or losses sustained during the late war, were referred to the Secretary of the Treasury to examine and report to the present session.

It further appears to your committee, that the several petitions of John McGarragh, Dudley Tyler, Patrick Bennett, John Hurt, James Gibbons, Archibald McAllister, Alexander Power, attorney for Col. Flower's regiment, Henry Malcom, and Charles Markle, respectively, praying to be compensated for military services rendered during the late war, were referred to the Secretary of War, to examine and report upon, to the present session.

It further appears to your committee, that the several petitions of Andrew Newell, Seth Clarke, Sarah Parker, Bartlett Hinds, Robert Frazier, David Sturges, Richard Phillips, James McLean, James Read, and Thomas Barclay, respectively, praying that certain claims which they exhibit against the United States, may be considered and allowed, were ordered to lie on the table, and so remained during the session.

It also appears to your committee, that the petition of Joseph Wheaton, sergeant-at-arms to this House, praying an inquiry into the charges exhibited against him in certain anonymous letters, was ordered to lie on the table, and so remained during the session.

Your committee further report, that committees were appointed to prepare and bring in the several bills following, to wit:

A bill to establish a uniform system on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States.

A bill for the further encouragement of the commerce and navigation of the United States.

A bill providing for the actual enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States.

Also, a bill providing a proper system of regulation for the militia of the United States.

Neither of which bills were reported during the session.

It also appears to your committee, that there were postponed by this House, for further consideration until the present session, the several bills, to wit:

A bill to promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries.

A bill for the establishment of hospitals, for the relief of sick and disabled seamen, and prescribing regulations for the harbors of the United States.

A bill concerning the importation of certain persons prior to the year 1808.

A bill to establish a land-office in and for the Western Territory. Also, a bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States."

That the bill entitled "An act to establish the seat of Government of the United States," was postponed by the Senate, for the further consideration of an amendment proposed by this House, until the present session.

And lastly, That the report of the committee appointed to examine into the measures taken by Congress, and the State of Virginia, respecting lands reserved for the officers and soldiers of the said State was postponed by this House for further consideration, until the present session.

ANSWER TO THE PRESIDENT'S SPEECH.

Mr. SMITH, (of South Carolina,) from the committee appointed for the purpose of preparing an Address in answer to the President's Speech, presented a report; which being read,

Mr. PAGE moved to go into a Committee of the Whole on the same to-morrow, which was agreed to.

Mr. GOODHUE observed, that he was a member of the committee, appointed at the last session, to prepare a bill for taking the census, or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, and wished to know whether it was desired by the House that the committee should proceed on that business; if it was, it was necessary that the committee should be enlarged, in order to answer the object of their appointment effectually; but as that would be attended with some inconvenience, it would perhaps be best to discharge the old committee and appoint a new one, to consist of a member from each State; and, in order to take the sense of the House, he would make that motion.

Mr. SMITH (of South Carolina) wished the gentleman to withdraw his motion, in order that the House might go into the consideration of the several important matters recommended to their attention in the President's Speech, and refer them respectively to committees. If the gentleman from Massachusetts would conform to this sentiment, he would move to go into a Committee of the Whole for that purpose.

Mr. WHITE remarked, that the President's Speech had already been referred to a Committee of the Whole; it was therefore unnecessary to adopt the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. GOODHUE, however, agreed to suspend his motion until the House should decide upon Mr. SMITH's.

The question was then taken on Mr. SMITH's motion, and passed in the negative.

ON THE ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GOODHUE then stated to the House, that one object which he had in view in moving that the committee be dismissed, was to determine whether the business of last session should proceed from the stage in which it was left, or be taken up de novo.

Mr. LEE considered this as a question of some importance; but he did not hesitate to say that it was decided by the uniform practice of Parliament, and on long experience it was found to be attended with the least inconvenience to commence all their proceedings anew at the commencement of a new session; but as it was a question of order, he would refer the decision of it to the Chair.

Mr. SHERMAN thought it a question that ought to be decided by the joint resolution of both Houses.

Mr. PAGE was of opinion that each House ought to establish its own rules to govern its proceedings, and that as it was consistent with parliamentary usage to commence de novo the proceedings of each session, it would be proper for the House to pursue a like line of conduct.

Mr. TUCKER said it was a question that deserved very serious consideration, because an act might be passed at this session with the consent of only one branch of the Legislature, provided it was determined that the business should progress from the state in which it was left last September. He alluded to the bill respecting crimes and punishments, assented to by the Senate, and sent to this House for concurrence at the last session, and also the bill to establish the seat of Government of the United States, which had passed this House, and lay before the Senate for their assent to a small amendment.

If, on this occasion, the two Houses should establish different rules, one might proceed to pass one of those laws, contrary to the sense of the other, which would induce a consequent embarrassment; to avoid this, he thought it best that both Houses should be consulted, and establish a uniform rule. But, while he was urging these arguments, he did not mean to contend that this House was not left to its own discretion to establish such rules as the majority might think proper.

As the question had been left to the decision of the Chair, and several members called for Mr. SPEAKER's opinion, he stated to the House that it had been customary with those Legislative assemblies which he had the honor of being a member of since the Revolution, to continue the business from one session to another, during the time for which they were elected; but as this was not strictly consonant with the usage of the British Parliament, which some gentlemen think essential, although that body differ in many respects from this, and as the House had hitherto prescribed no rule in point, he did not conceive that the Chair ought to be considered as adequate to the decision.

Mr. SHERMAN said, it would involve an absurdity, if an act was to be passed by one House only in the session; because it would assert in its title that it was an act of the whole Congress done at a session when one branch had never acted upon it; he was therefore of opinion, that the unfinished business which had passed from the one branch of the Legislature to the other, ought to commence anew at the present session.

Mr. WHITE did not wish to hurry on a decision of this important question, though he was himself well prepared for it. He had never an idea but the business of a former session terminated with the session, and was to be taken up de novo at the subsequent meeting; this had been the invariable practice of Parliament through the period of their existence. If, then, it had been found advantageous by so enlightened a body, for a period of five hundred years, their experience was sufficient to satisfy his mind of its propriety; and nothing but solid and substantial objections would induce him to deviate from that principle. But, besides the practice of Great Britain, he could adduce the mode of transacting business in Virginia, which was exactly conformable to the former instance.

Order of Business.

He stated one instance in order to show the impropriety of a different conduct. The State of North Carolina had come into the Union during the recess; the laws that were not perfected before that period ought not to bind her until she had an opportunity of having a voice in enacting them. Now, if the unfinished business was to go on from the stage where it was left last session, a single hour might bind her contrary to her will, and contrary to the sentiments of a majority of the people.

Mr. SMITH (of South Carolina) said, the best way of trying the question, whether the business was to be considered as dead or not, was to move to appoint committees to the purposes for which such committees were appointed at the last session, and not to discharge the committee, as moved by the gentleman from Massachusetts, because both the affirmative and negative implied that the committees are still in existence, which is the point in dispute.

Mr. LEE favored this last opinion, and hoped the question would be taken upon it.

Mr. LIVERMORE heartily concurred with the several gentlemen that were up, in this, that both the Senate and House ought to establish some rule on this subject, and that the rule ought to be the same in both Houses. He wished it to be done before the business of the Legislature was thrown into confusion by a vote of one branch, which would not be acceded to by the other; for this reason, he moved that a committee be appointed to confer with a committee of the Senate, and report to both Houses a uniform rule of proceeding relative to the business of last session. As to his own opinion on this subject, he was free to declare, as his private judgment, that the business of the late session was at an end.

Mr. GOODHUE thought the first motion the best to settle the question, and therefore hoped it would be first put. He further observed, that there was a necessity for discharging the committee of three appointed to digest a plan for taking the census, because they were inadequate to the object. The mode of enumerating the inhabitants of the several States depended a good deal upon certain local regulations, and consequently required the circumstance of local information in those who were to bring forward the bill. This, he apprehended, would be best attained by forming the committee of a member from each State.

Mr. WHITE thought it of no use to appoint a committee to confer with a committee of the Senate, because they might report contrary to the sense of the House.

Mr. LEE was of the same sentiment, and urged the propriety of deciding the question under a sure reliance that the Senate would pursue the same line of conduct, and the practice would be established at once.

Mr. CLYMER.—It appeared to him that the decision of the question which now agitated the House was anticipated, at least the former determination ought to have considerable influence on the present vote. If all business was to commence de novo, why did the House appoint a committee to examine and bring forward the unfinished business of the last session? Either the House did not conceive the business dead, or it acted with some degree of absurdity in the appointment of that committee, because a committee could not be appointed on any business until that business was revived by motion, or a new application.

Mr. PARTRIDGE thought, with the gentleman last up, that the business of last session was still before the House, and he was confirmed in this sentiment by several votes taken at their former meeting, by which the business then under consideration had been expressly postponed till the present session. The Senate had likewise adopted a similar practice, as was announced in their message of the 28th September, in which it is said that the Senate have postponed until the next session of Congress, the consideration of the amendment proposed by this House to the bill for establishing the seat of Government of the United States.

Mr. PAGE requested the gentleman last up to declare what the word session meant in this case; and observed, in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. CLYMER,) that if the business was to proceed from the stage in which it was left, there was no necessity of a committee to examine the journal, as it would have gone on as a matter of course.

Mr. SHERMAN was of opinion that the business which was undecided on by either House might proceed, but that which had passed one branch, and laid before the other for concurrence, ought to be taken up de novo. He said this idea made it perfectly consistent to appoint a committee to report the unfinished business.

Mr. BOWDINOT thought a uniform rule ought to be established between the two Houses.

Mr. SMITH (of South Carolina) said it was a very important question, as it related to the present circumstances of Congress. It is very important as a precedent, and would be of peculiar importance to the distant States at all times hereafter. If it is determined that the House may proceed to finish business left incomplete at their last session, it might be destructive of that harmony which he wished to be ever preserved. The members from the States near to the seat of Government might assemble early in the session, and carry measures through with the bare majority of a very thin House, inimical to the public welfare. He thought these solid reasons for commencing all business anew.

TUESDAY, January 12.

ANSWER TO THE PRESIDENT'S SPEECH.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Address in answer to the President's Speech to both Houses.

Mr. BALDWIN being placed in the Chair, the Address was read as follows:

The Address of the House of Representatives to the President of the United States.

The Representatives of the people of the United States have taken into consideration your Speech to both Houses of Congress at the opening of the present session.

We reciprocate your congratulations on the accession of North Carolina; an event which, while it is a testimony of the increasing good will towards the Government of the Union, cannot fail to give additional dignity and strength to the American Republic, already rising in the estimation of the world in national character and respectability.

The information that our measures of the last session have not proved satisfactory to our constituents, affords us much encouragement at this juncture, when we are resuming the arduous task of legislating for so extensive an empire.

Nothing can be more gratifying to the representatives of a free people than the reflection, that their labors are rewarded by the approbation of their fellow-citizens. Under this impression, we shall make every exertion to realize their expectations, and to secure to them those blessings which Providence has placed within their reach. Still prompted by the same desire to promote their interests which then actuated us, we shall, in the present session, diligently and anxiously pursue those measures which shall appear to us conducive to that end.

We concur with you in the sentiment that agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, are entitled to legislative protection, and that the promotion of science and literature will contribute to the security of a free Government; in the progress of our deliberations, we shall not lose sight of objects so worthy of our regard.

The various and weighty matters which you have judged necessary to recommend to our attention appear to us essential to the tranquillity and welfare of the Union, and claim our early and most serious consideration. We shall proceed, without delay, to bestow on them that calm discussion which their importance requires.

We regret that the pacific arrangements pursued with regard to certain hostile tribes of Indians, have not been attended with that success which we had reason to expect from them; we shall not hesitate to concur in such further measures as may best obviate any ill effects which might be apprehended from the failure of those negotiations.

Your approbation of the vote of this House at the last session, respecting the provision for the public creditors, is very acceptable to us: the proper mode of carrying that resolution into effect, being a subject in which the future character and happiness of these States are deeply involved, will be among the first to claim our attention.

The prosperity of the United States is the primary object of all our deliberations, and we cherish the reflection, that every measure which we may adopt for its advancement, will not only receive your cheerful con-

Mr. LAWRENCE thought the word session implied that all the proceedings of the Legislature were to cease at its expiration, and to commence anew after the recess, whether the body consisted of the same members or otherwise, and did not doubt but both Houses would concur in this opinion.

Mr. WHITE did not think the House ought to appoint a committee to confer with a committee of the Senate, because its object was to guard against an inconvenience that might never occur. Perhaps if this House decides that business shall commence de novo, the Senate may do the same, and there will be no occasion for a consultation; but if they differ, it will be time enough to appoint a committee of conference.

The reason why the practice in Pennsylvania differed from that of the British Parliament might be on account of a Constitutional difference in the mode of considering bills. By the Constitution, the Assembly of Pennsylvania is obliged to submit all its bills to the people for their consideration, who are intended to act, in some degree, as another House, and check the decisions of a Legislative body consisting of a single branch.

Mr. LIVERMORE hoped the opinion, which seemed generally to prevail in this House, might be adopted by the Senate, and then he had no doubt but the practice of both branches of the Legislature would be uniform; but he still was inclined to think it would be better to settle it in a joint committee.

The question was, by consent, taken on Mr. LIVERMORE'S motion, and that being lost,

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, moved that a committee of ten, to consist of a member from each State, be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill for the actual enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States.

On the question, this motion was carried in the affirmative without a division: when the following gentlemen were elected a committee by ballot:

Messrs. Foster, Goodhue, Lawrence, Schureman, Sherman, Clymer, Seney, White, Smith, of South Carolina, and Baldwin.

A Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, by Mr. T. Lear, was received, with the following communication:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

I have directed Mr. Lear, my private Secretary, to lay before you a copy of the adoption and ratification of the Constitution of the United States by the State of North Carolina, together with the copy of a letter from his Excellency Samuel Johnston, President of the Convention of said State, to the President of the United States.

The original of the papers which are herewith transmitted to you will be lodged in the office of the Secretary of State.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, January 14, 1790.

The Message and accompanying papers being read, the House adjourned.

currence, but will at the same time derive from your co-operation additional efficacy in ensuring to our fellow-citizens the blessings of a free, efficient, and equal Government.

FRED'K A. MUHLBERG,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BOUNDINOT moved to strike out at the beginning of the third paragraph "the information," because the House were possessed of this knowledge by other means; they had, during the recess of Congress, an opportunity of consulting their constituents, and could therefore say of their own motion, that the measures of the last session have not proved dissatisfactory.

Mr. CLYMER, as one of the committee appointed to prepare a report, had agreed to the Address, but he did not think himself precluded from agreeing to what he supposed would be an amendment. The words appeared to him necessary, as they were strongly implied, inasmuch as the Address was in answer to the Speech of the President, which really contained such information.

Mr. SMITH (of South Carolina) contended, that the House had no information with respect to the satisfaction their constituents experienced in the measures of the last session, except what was contained in the President's Speech. He did not presume to deny, but every individual member of Congress might have received information of this nature in private conversation with the people, but no official communication could possibly be got at; it was therefore necessary to recognise, in the Address, the quarter from whence they drew that information; in this view he considered the words necessary, and hoped they would be retained.

Mr. BOUNDINOT meant to avoid the idea that it was from the Executive alone they drew this information, when it was a notorious fact, perceptible to common observation.

Mr. LAWRENCE said, the Executive was the proper source to draw such information from, and he was very happy to learn it from so respectable a quarter; he therefore hoped it would be permitted to remain in the report.

The question was now taken for striking out the words, and it passed in the negative. It was then moved to strike out, in the first line of the fourth paragraph, the word "gratifying" and insert "grateful."

Mr. WADSWORTH did not mean to call in question the right of gentlemen to amend the Address in what manner they thought proper, but he would just remark, that the composition of two or three gentlemen, done with deliberation and coolness, generally had more elegance and pertinency, than the patchwork of a large assembly. He should therefore vote against every alteration that went to nothing more than to change the style; if gentlemen were disposed to contend for principle, he should listen to them with attention, but decide according to the best of his judgment, but he really conceived it to be a waste of time to discuss the propriety of two such terms as "grateful" and "gratifying."

Mr. PAGE hoped that gentlemen would proceed to amend the Address in such a way as to give it the highest degree of perfection. He would rather have his feelings hurt, provided the language of the Address should be improved, than that an Address should go from this body with any incorrectness whatever. He hoped the House would always criticise upon, strike out, and amend, whatever matter was before them with boldness and freedom. And he would observe to gentlemen, that the most refined and accurate writers were never ashamed to have it said of them, that they blotted out.

Mr. WHITE said, that every gentleman had an undoubted right to take the sense of the House upon an amendment, and that it ought not to be considered as a reflection upon those who drew up the Address.

Mr. WADSWORTH did not intend to be a critic, but thought he understood the meaning of the words gratifying and grateful, and he conceived the difference to be too trifling to engage the attention of the House. He hoped that he had been as modest as a man could be in his observations, and was sorry to have drawn his worthy friend from Virginia into any severities.

Mr. THACHER apprehended the meaning of these two words to be the same, and the reception of either was only important as it related to the measure or harmony of the period. Now those gentlemen who are qualified to decide this point, might vote for the substitute; but for his part he was very well satisfied with it as it stood.

Mr. STRANGIS wished the sentence struck out altogether, because he did not conceive the assertion to be true; for he did believe that there was something which could and ought to be more gratifying to the representatives of a free people than the reflection that their labors are rewarded by the approbation of their fellow-citizens; to be sure it was a grateful reflection, but there was one much more so, which was, that their labors had tended to advance the real interests of the people. If it is, as it ought to be, our highest ambition to promote the general interest, it must be most gratifying to us to learn that we have attained that desirable end.

Mr. PAGE had only heard some expressions from the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. WADSWORTH,) which he imagined had a tendency to discourage the House from making necessary alterations; but he was convinced, from the known candor and impartiality of that gentleman, that he must not have fully comprehended his intentions, and therefore begged to apologise to him for any thing he might have said partaking of severity.

The question was now put for striking out "gratifying" and inserting "grateful," and passed in the negative.

The committee then agreed to the report, rose, and the Chairman reported it without amendment. Mr. SPEAKER being seated in the Chair, the Address was read again and unanimously agreed to by the House.

It was then moved that a committee be appointed ed to wait on the President of the United States, to learn from him at what time, and in what place, he would receive this Address. Messrs. SMITH, (of South Carolina,) CLYMER, and LAWRENCE, were appointed the committee on this occasion.

A Message from the President of the United States, by H. KNOX, Secretary at War, was received, in which the President informed the House, that he had made to them an unreserved but confidential communication of the situation of the Southern and Western frontiers, and Indian Department: immediately after this letter was read, on motion, the galleries were cleared.

WEDNESDAY, January 13.

BENJAMIN HUNTINGTON, from Connecticut; LAMBERT CADWALADER, from New Jersey; DANIEL HEISTER, from Pennsylvania, and WILLIAM SMITH, from Maryland, appeared and took their seats.

On motion of Mr. LEE, it was Ordered, That so much of the Standing Rules of this House, as directs the mode of appointing committees, be rescinded, and that hereafter it be a standing rule of the House, that all committees shall be appointed by the Speaker, unless otherwise specially directed by the House, in which case they shall be appointed by ballot, and if, upon such ballot, the number required shall not be elected by a majority of the votes given, the House shall proceed to a second ballot, in which a plurality of votes shall prevail; and in case a greater number than are required to compose or complete the committee shall have an equal number of votes, the House shall proceed to a further ballot or ballots.

Mr. SMITH (of South Carolina) reported that the PRESIDENT would be ready to receive their Address to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

The House resumed the reading of the statement of the Southwestern frontiers, and of the Indian Department, as referred to in the PRESIDENT'S Message of yesterday; whereupon,

Ordered, That the said Message and statement be referred to a committee of five, and that Messieurs WADSWORTH, BROWN, BOUNDINOT, BURKE, and BALDWIN, be the said committee.

THURSDAY, January 14.

THEODORE SEDGWICK, from Massachusetts, and THOMAS HARTLEY, from Pennsylvania, appeared and took their seats.

On motion, Messrs. LIVERMORE, AMES, LAWRENCE, SCOTT, and SMITH, were added to the committee appointed yesterday on the affairs of the Indian Department.

The House then went and presented the Address to the PRESIDENT, to which the PRESIDENT was pleased to make the following reply:

Gentlemen:

I receive with pleasure the assurances you give me, that you will diligently and anxiously pursue such measures as shall appear to you conducive to the interests of your constituents; and that an early and serious consideration will be given to the various and weighty matters recommended by me to your attention.

I have full confidence that your deliberations will continue to be directed by an enlightened and virtuous zeal for the happiness of our country.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

A report was received from the Secretary of the Treasury, made in pursuance of the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 21st of September last, with a plan for the support of the Public Credit, a copy of which will be found in the Appendix.

On motion, it was Ordered, That the consideration of the foregoing report be the order of the day for this day fortnight, and that it be printed, in the interim, for the use of the members.

FRIDAY, January 15.

JAMES JACKSON, from Georgia, appeared and took his seat.

The Secretary of War made a report on the petition of James Gibbon, Archibald M'Allister, Dudley Tyler, John Hurst, Henry Malcomb, Peter Bennet, Charles Markley, Alexander Power, and John M'Garrah, which being read, were ordered, with the petitions themselves, to lie on the table.

UNFINISHED BUSINESS.

Mr. HARTLEY said, that as there was much important business before the House last session which had been left incomplete, it was incumbent upon them to fix some rule, founded in justice, not only as a direction for the House through this session, but for a guide to succeeding ones, in what manner the business postponed from one session to another should be conducted. He was told that the subject had been already agitated, but he was not yet decided; but as it was of importance that it should be so, he intended, before he sat down, to offer a motion that would preface it with an observation in reply to what he understood had been advanced, "that a Constitutional adjournment of both Houses was in effect the same as a prorogation." He knew very well that a prorogation or dissolution of the Parliament of Britain destroyed all unfinished business; and that nothing was resumed at a subsequent meeting until the session was opened by the King. But an adjournment of Congress, whether for a greater or less time, left the business to be resumed precisely in the same state it stood at such adjournment. He wished to determine this point absolutely, and that it might not be done with surprise or in an indirect way, he would move to take up the bill to promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries, which stood postponed by the express order of the House from the last to the present session. This bill, he observed, was solicited by some very ingenious men, to secure to them their writings and inventions; it had been early ordered in last session, and was intended to have passed, but the multiplicity of other important business had caused it to be postponed, as he had just related. Gentlemen might remember that a committee was appointed to report the business it was necessary to finish before the recess; they might also remember how desirous gentlemen were of having a recess; but if it had been considered that such a measure was to destroy all the labor of the House which had not brought its object to maturity, it would have been an insuperable objection against any adjournment whatever. He considered a vote that should annihilate all that they had hitherto done as a great piece of injustice to the public, who entertained a hope that considerable progress was made in the Legislative business left incomplete at the last session, and was on the part of the House creating unnecessary trouble and expense; he saw no propriety in renewing subjects which had been well discussed, and the principles of which were well understood, unless gentlemen were desirous of travelling over the ground again in order to show a nearer route to bring them to their journey's end.

He was ready to show that it was in the power of the House to establish the rule he meant to contend for, and that this rule was the one most likely to promote the public good in giving a necessary despatch to public measures.

Mr. WHITE wished the motion to lie on the table for consideration, but he was somewhat deceived in it, because the gentleman had intimated a desire to establish an absolute rule. Now, deciding this question would leave the subject still afloat, because he might be in favor of proceeding in one bill that was brought forward by motion, and against taking up another.

Mr. HARTLEY.—If the House determine to take up this bill, I apprehend the principle will be established that is to direct our future proceedings. If all business is dismissed by the last adjournment, it will be improper to adopt my motion; but I hope gentlemen will not endeavor to prevent its being fairly discussed and decided by introducing an indirect question.

Mr. BOURNOR thought the question would not establish a uniform rule, because it was confined to a single object, which depended, in a great measure, on its own merits.

Mr. SEDGWICK said, it was in the power of any gentleman to bring forward business by motion; but in such case the principle contended for would remain untouched. A member might move and carry a question for taking up any paper on the files of the House, but still the point respecting the general termination of the business at the last session would be undetermined. He thought if gentlemen were disposed to bring the matter to issue, they ought to move a general proposition, such as that the House proceed with the business of the late session from the state in which it was then left; though he would not say but, on reflection, he should be against such a motion.

Mr. PAGE said it was impossible, from the nature of Parliamentary proceedings, that the business of a former session could be resumed and proceeded in, as if no interval had taken place; and he contended that the effect of a prorogation and adjournment of a session was the same. The motion, by consent, was ordered to lie on the table.

PRESIDENT'S SPEECH.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; Mr. BALDWIN in the Chair. After some time, the committee rose and reported to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee that the several matters recommended by the President of the United States in his Speech to both Houses of Congress, relating to a provision for the national defence; to the promotion of manufactures for essential, particularly military, supplies; to a compensation to the persons employed in the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations; to the establishing an uniform rule of naturalization; to the establishment of uniformity in the currency, weights, and measures; to the advancement of the agriculture, commerce, and manufactures of the United States; to the encouragement of useful inventions; to the establishment of post offices and post roads; and to the promotion of science and literature; ought severally to be referred to select committees to be appointed by the House, to prepare and bring in a bill or bills, providing for each particular purpose.

The said resolution being again read,

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills providing for the national defence; and that Mr. GILMAN, Mr. PETER MUHLENBERG, Mr. HEISTER, Mr. MATHEWS, and Mr. FLOYD, be of the said committee.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills for making compensation to persons employed in the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations; and that Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. HUNTINGTON, and Mr. LEE, be of the said committee.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills for establishing a uniform rule of naturalization, and that Mr. HARTLEY, Mr. TUCKER, and Mr. MOORE, be of the said committee.

Ordered, That it be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and report to this House, a proper plan or plans, conformably to the recommendation of the President of the United States, in his Speech to both Houses of Congress, for the encouragement and promotion of such manufactures as will tend to render the United States independent of other nations for essential, particularly for military supplies.

Ordered, That it be referred to the Secretary of State to prepare and report to this House in like manner, a proper plan or plans for establishing uniformity in the currency, weights, and measures of the United States.

On motion of Mr. GOODRUE,

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills to make such alteration in the laws of the United States as are necessary to conform the same to the present circumstances of the State of North Carolina; and

REPORTING THE DEBATES.

Mr. HARTLEY moved an adjournment, when Mr. PAGE rose and said, he wished to call the attention of the House before they adjourned, to a subject which he thought of importance, and which ought no longer to be in the undecided state it had been in since the last session. It was this: whether the persons who had taken down and published the debates of the House, by the tacit consent of the members, during the last session, and who had withdrawn from the seats they then held in the House, to the gallery, during this session, might not return to the same seats? He supposed that they had, modestly withdrawn, on the supposition that the debate which took place just before the adjournment, showed that the sense of the members was against their sitting in the House; but the contrary was the case; that he knew their publications had given great satisfaction to many of the constituents of that House; that the House was applauded for its conduct on that occasion, both at home and abroad, and had been highly commended for it in some British publications; that he was anxious that the short-hand writers should resume their seats in the House, lest it might be insinuated by the jealous enemies of our Government, that the House of Representatives were more republican and indulgent the last session than this; that in removing those writers to the gallery was but a step towards removing them from the House, and that this suspicion would be increased by circumstances which, however innocent, nay proper in themselves, might be misunderstood, and excite uneasiness. The doors of the gallery had been two days shut, the House had made a parade through the streets, and had displayed their eagle in their hall; that these circumstances, if followed by the exclusion of the short-hand writers, might spread an alarm which ought to be avoided; he therefore hoped that those gentlemen who had retired to the gallery might be informed that they might return to the seats they occupied in the last session—that he avoided making a regular motion to this effect, because he knew that some worthy members who wished to admit those writers, or any others, did not think their admission ought to be sanctioned by vote, and appear on the journals, lest that might sanction and authenticate erroneous publications; but that if he should not discover that the sense of the members present was in favor of the ideas he had expressed, that to-morrow he would bring forward a motion made by a member from South Carolina, (Mr. TUCKER,) last session, for that purpose; for he had no fears that a vote of the House to authorize the admission of such writers, would make the House answerable for their publications.

Mr. HARTLEY withdrew his motion for adjournment, in order that the subject alluded to by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. PAGE) might be understood.

Mr. WHITE said, he felt averse to enter into a positive resolution for the admission of any person to take down the debates, but wished them permitted to a convenient seat within the bar for the purpose of hearing with greater accuracy. But he feared that a vote of the House would give a sanction to the details, which the publications ought not to have. Not that he thought them worse than similar publications in other countries; on the contrary, he thought them better, if he judged from what had fallen under his particular observation. And what he recollected to have from others. He did not wish a positive motion for the admission of short-hand writers, because gentlemen might object to a vote of the kind, and he should be very loth to discourage publications of the advantages of which he was well convinced; he knew they had given great satisfaction to the people of America, and it was a satisfaction of which he would not deprive them. Although these publications had not given an exact and accurate detail of all that passed in Congress, yet their information had been pretty full, and he believed the errors not very many; those that were made, he supposed to arise rather from haste or inadvertence, than from design. He was convinced of this, from the disposition the publishers had manifested to correct any errors that were pointed out, and the pains they sometimes took to ask gentlemen what were their particular expressions, when they either did not hear distinctly, or did not comprehend the speaker's meaning. He wished, therefore, the business might go on; but silently, as it had heretofore done, without the express approbation of the House. He was fully convinced that neither the editor of the Register nor any other man, but the members of the House, had a right to a seat within these walls, without the consent of every member; but he thought this consent would be tacitly given if no gentleman opposed their introduction, and in this way he most heartily concurred with his colleague in agreeing to the admission of such persons as thought themselves qualified, and were inclined to take down and publish their debates and proceedings; he should be glad to see them in the seats they had last session, but he should object to the vote being entered on the journals of the House.

Mr. BOURNOR thought the mode proper to be pursued on this occasion, would be to give a discretionary power to the Speaker to admit such persons as he thought proper. Under such a regulation, short-hand writers might be admitted, without giving to their publications any degree of Legislative authority.

Mr. THACHERA hoped that it was not the intention of gentlemen to confine the business to one person only, because others might appear, of equal capacity and equally deserving of encouragement.

Mr. PAGE said, he did not wish to confine the vote to any two or three writers, he cared not how many were admitted. It ought to be remembered, that he said, when this subject was before the House at the last session, that he saw no reason why Mr. Fenno should not be within the house as well as Mr. Lloyd, instead of being in the gallery. He had no objection to admitting any number of short-hand writers, provided they did not incommodate the members.

Mr. SMITH, (of South Carolina.)—I do not wish, Mr. Speaker, to exclude others from a convenient seat; but at the same time, I think those who were here before have a pre-emption right to the best. I assure you, sir, I am sorry for the loss of them off the floor, because I think their publications had a salutary tendency. It has been said, that it was the design of the short-hand writers to give a partial representation of our proceedings. I believe, if they are not correctly given, it is owing to the hurry in which business of this kind is conducted, and I am confirmed in this opinion, by some errors which I have discovered in the publication of our proceedings. It was said that a committee was appointed to bring in a bill for the preservation and safe-keeping of the accounts of the United States. I thought within myself that we were not so tenacious on this head, therefore suspected some mistake, and on consulting the journals I found that a committee had been appointed to bring in a bill for the safe-keeping and preservation of the acts of the United States: The similarity of the letters in these two words, and the great abridgment short-hand writers are obliged to make for the sake of expedition, may have caused him to substitute the one for the other; in another place, I found a greater blunder still: it was said, that the House had appointed a committee for the regulation of the barbers of the United States; this struck me as a very gross misrepresentation, for I could hardly believe that the Legislature of the Union would, at so early a day, attempt to usurp an authority not vested in them by the Constitution, and that, too, over a body of men, who could at any time put an end to the tyranny with the edge of the razor; but, on searching the minutes in this case, I found that a bill was brought in for the regulation of the harbors of the United States. Upon the whole, I believe, inaccurate as this work is, it has given to our constituents great satisfaction, and I should be glad to see our Argus restored to his former situation behind the Speaker's Chair, from whence he could both see and hear distinctly every thing that passed in the House.

THOMAS SINICKSON, from New Jersey, and MICHAEL JENIFER STONE, from Maryland, appeared and took their seats.

A petition of Hannibal W. Dobbins, of the kingdom of Ireland, praying that Congress may grant him a tract of land upon such reasonable terms as may encourage him to bring settlers to the country, was read and referred to Messrs. PAGE, SCOTT, and PARTRIDGE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Treasurer of the State of New York, together with a copy of the revised laws of the said State, sent in pursuance of concurrent resolutions of the Senate and Assembly thereof, for the use of the House.

Mr. FOSTER, from the committee appointed, presented, according to order, a bill providing for the actual enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, which was read the first time.

TUESDAY, January 19.

The bill for enumerating the inhabitants of the United States was read a second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole.

ON FOREIGN INTERCOURSE.

Mr. SEBOWICK, from the committee to whom was referred that part of the President's Speech relative to making provision for persons employed in the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations, stated that the committee had some doubts on their mind respecting the extent of such provision, or rather the construction of the words of the resolution under which they were appointed; they doubt if a strict construction would authorize them to report a bill making a general provision for every grade of foreign ministers, or whether, on the contrary, they are not tied down to provide for those only who are now in existence. He had been desired by the committee to suggest this doubt, and request the instruction of the House.

Mr. SMITH, (of South Carolina,) said he wished to refer to the President's Speech in order to ascertain what was the intention of the House in appointing this committee; because the President's Speech was the ground on which they proceeded to act.

The President's Speech being read, together with the resolutions of the House founded thereon.

Mr. SEBOWICK said it was clear, from the President's Message, what were his intentions; but the words of the resolution appointing a committee, obscured, in some degree, the intentions of the House; it is there said that the committee should bring in a bill for making compensation to persons employed, which seemed to confine the deliberations of the committee to that particular object.

He did not know but this provision was intended immediately to be made by the House, and the other part, which related to those hereafter to be employed in the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations, left until information could be obtained from the Secretary of State; he did not see any inconvenience that would attend leaving the business altogether undecided until his arrival, which he expected might be soon, provided the gentleman accepted his appointment. He supposed the Secretary of State had paid more attention, and possessed more information on this subject, than the committee had it in their power to do, or obtain. He wished it therefore left unacted upon until the Secretary should be ready to report to the House, provided the business of the nation did not suffer by the delay, but this was a point he would not pretend to determine; it might be necessary, for all he knew, that the United States should be represented in some of the Courts of Europe, where they are not at present represented.

Mr. PAGE moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, in order that it might be brought forward and determined upon in a Committee of the Whole. He thought this the most likely way to obtain the sense of the House on the plan which should be pursued, and whether it was proper to make a general regulation providing for the several grades in the diplomatic corps that may hereafter be employed, as well as those already in the service of the Union.

Mr. LEE was sensible that the resolution of the House appointing a committee, was intended to be founded on the President's Speech, and he supposed that the President had selected this object for the consideration of the House; because he had not the means of sending persons to foreign Courts, which the interests of the United States may require. It seemed, therefore, to look as a general regulation of the different grades of officers which are employed in the business of embassy; but this latitude was curtailed by the expressions of the House. He hoped, therefore, that the House would instruct the committee whether they should make such general regulations as they deemed necessary, or be confined to making provision for persons already appointed.

Mr. WHITE was in favor of a general provision; because it might be found necessary to send ambassadors extraordinary to foreign nations, and an adequate provision for their support ought to be made, and known by such officers at the time they accepted their appointment, otherwise the President might be considerably embarrassed, whenever he intended to employ them.

Mr. JACKSON remarked, that there was no compensation for the foreign ministers provided by the laws in the last session; yet it was as necessary that their salaries should be known, as that of any other officer in the Government; but he thought, before the committee proceeded in the business, that an arrangement should be made of the officers necessary to be employed at foreign Courts: after it was ascertained what grade of officers should be employed at the Court of Britain, the Court of France, and so on, the committee might report a provision conformable to such an arrangement; he would not say, however, that it might not be proper to refer the subject to the Secretary of State, so far as to learn what places it would be proper to send Ministers to. He confessed that it was his opinion the committee was in the dark on this point.

Mr. SEBOWICK said, that the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. PAGE,) had made a motion, if he understood him right, which met his ideas, and he would second it; for he verily believed that, under the present circumstances, it would be the most eligible course to discharge the committee, and wait the arrival of the Secretary of State, to get fuller information.

Mr. SMITH (of South Carolina) could not see why the committee ought to be discharged, if they were competent to bring in a bill, and this he supposed they were without waiting the arrival of the Secretary of State. The arrangement which some gentlemen talked of, lay with the President and Senate. It is they who are to determine when and where to send ambassadors and other public ministers; all that the House has to do is to make provision for their support. The question then is, not whether any should be appointed, because it does not lie with the House to determine. To be sure, if they were of opinion that all intercourse with foreign nations should be cut off, they might decline to make provision for them; but he did not believe this was the intention of any gentleman. Perhaps gentlemen may think it questionable whether the President can send them, unless they are previously established by law; but for his part he thought it was a business clearly within the Executive branch, and with which the Legislature had nothing to do, but to provide for the payment of their salaries and expenses; and this, if it was properly considered, was a competent check. If the House at any time neglected to provide for such officers, the President must either recall them or pay them out of his private purse. From this view of the subject, he could not see any good reason why the committee should not pursue the business; they could make a general regulation, containing a provision for ambassadors, ministers, residents, and chargé des affaires, leaving to the President and Senate to judge which of those they would employ on any occasion where they thought them necessary. He conceived it improper to refer this part of the business to the Secretary of State, when the Constitution placed it expressly in other hands.

Mr. SHERMAN was inclined to think that the Legislature ought to determine how many ministers should be employed abroad; nor did he think it would be any abridgment of the Executive power so to do.

Mr. PAGE wished the committee might be discharged, in order to settle the principles on which the House was to act. He conceived it to be the most expeditious way of doing business, to settle the principles first, and then put it into the hands of a select committee, to draught a bill conformably thereto. He thought if they proceeded in this manner, that the Secretary of State might be here in time to give them what information gentlemen seemed to want.

Mr. WHITE said, it had never been a question in his mind whether the President and Secretary had a right to appoint such foreign ministers as they thought proper; the power was expressly given to them by the Constitution, and was consequently placed without the jurisdiction of this House. If the contrary doctrine was established, that the President could send no foreign minister but what he was authorized by law to send, the most inconvenient consequences might result. The exigencies that required such an appointment might be over before the Legislature convened for the purpose of authorizing him to make it.

Mr. JACKSON granted that exigencies might arise, where it would be necessary for the preservation of the public tranquillity, that the President should enter into a negotiation with a foreign State; but he would ask the gentleman how it was possible for the President to establish the salaries of such negotiators as he thought it expedient to employ, without the consent of Congress? Or do gentlemen mean to give the same sum to the ministers who may be employed at the petty Courts up the Mediterranean; as to those sent to the principal and most important nations of Europe? Would they give a resident at Genoa as much as a Minister at Paris or Madrid? This can neither be the meaning nor intention of gentlemen. Then I appeal to them, whether it is not absolutely necessary for a proper arrangement to be made before we proceed in the business? After the arrangement is made, the committee will find every thing clear and easy to determine.

The President would find it a tender point to establish the salary of a foreign minister, if any thing discretionary is left in his power on this head. I therefore think, in order to avoid embarrassments, both with respect to him and the gentlemen who shall be employed to go abroad, that the Legislature should make some express provision for every circumstance that may arise, at least as far as we can decide upon the best attainable information. Perhaps it would be proper to wait the arrival of the Secretary of State, in order to get that light thrown on the subject which it requires. For these reasons, I should favor the motion made by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, for discharging the committee.

Mr. LEE did not conceive it necessary to contemplate the question which had now been drawn into view. He believed all that was before the House was suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, which was, that the committee had doubts on their minds relative to the provision to be made for existing officers, employed in the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations, and those that might hereafter be employed in such intercourse. He had the honor of being of the committee, but he confessed that he had not much hesitation in determining for himself what was the proper duty of the committee. He thought that the President's Speech, upon which the whole business seemed to be grounded, authorized them to take up the subject generally. He conceived the proper question before the House to be, whether they would give instructions to the committee on this point; and in order that it might be decided with precision, he would move that it be an instruction to that committee, to include in such provision as they shall make for the persons to be employed in the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations, a compensation to persons who may hereafter be employed in such intercourse. When the committee had proceeded on that instruction, and brought in their provision accordingly, the whole subject would be before the House, and then might be the proper time to discuss the question brought forward by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. PAGE wished to take the sense of the House first on discharging the committee. Whereupon, the question for discharging the committee was put and lost.

Mr. PARTRIDGE asked whether it was in contemplation to report, under the instruction moved for, a bill for compensating all the grades of the diplomatic corps? If it was, he would suggest a circumstance that had taken place under the late Congress, which was, that no person above the grade of a Minister Plenipotentiary should be employed in negotiating with foreign nations. Whether this resolution was now in force or not, he would not pretend to determine; but he presumed the House were now prepared to enter on the establishment of a corps of ambassadors, ministers, envoys, and chargés des affaires.

Mr. BOUNDINOT thought it would be best to make the report full and complete; and, as the House were not bound by the opinion of the committee, they might then make such alterations as they thought proper.

On the question, the motion made by Mr. LEE for instructing the committee was carried in the affirmative.

Mr. PAGE, from the committee to whom was referred the petition from Hannibal William Dobbyn, made a report.

REPORT FROM THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

The Secretary of the Treasury reported on the petition of Christopher Saddler, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 19, 1790.

In obedience to the order of the House of Representatives of the 11th instant, referring to the Secretary of the Treasury the petition of Christopher Saddler, the said Secretary most respectfully reports:

That, except the letter from the Collector of the district of Boston and Charlestown, accompanying the petition, there is no evidence immediately within reach respecting the ground of the application for relief.

That, though that letter is entirely satisfactory to the mind of the Secretary, the affair is of a nature to entitle the petitioner to relief; yet he does not consider it such a document, as, in point of precedent, would justify the interposition of the Legislature to grant it. The Secretary will therefore take measures for a more regular authentication of the nature of the transaction, and will submit the result. To this there is the further inducement of its being necessary to ascertain whether the persons who may be interested in the forfeiture, are disposed to relinquish their right.

The Secretary, however, begs leave to avail himself of the occasion, to represent to the House, that there are other instances which have come under his notice, in which considerable forfeitures have been incurred, manifestly through inadvertence and want of information: circumstances which cannot fail to attend the recent promulgation of laws of such a nature, and seem to indicate the necessity, in conformity to the usual policy of commercial nations, of vesting somewhere a discretionary power of granting relief.

That necessity, though peculiarly great in the early stages of new regulations, does not cease to operate throughout the progress of them. There occasionally occur accidents from which heavy and ruinous forfeitures ensue, that require the constant existence of some power capable of affording relief. The proper investment of such a power is a matter of too much delicacy and importance to be determined otherwise than upon mature deliberation. Yet the Secretary begs leave to submit to the consideration of the House, whether a temporary arrangement might not be made with expedition and safety, which would avoid the inconvenience of a Legislative decision on particular applications. All which is humbly submitted.

ALEX. HAMILTON,

Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SMITH thought it would be proper to refer this report to a select committee, as there appeared to be a pointed necessity for extending relief in this and similar cases.

Mr. BOUNDINOT seconded the motion. Mr. STONE wished the business could come before them in some other way; he thought it would be improper to take it up in its present form.

Mr. BOUNDINOT suspected, as the gentleman was not here when the petition of Christopher Saddler came first before the House, that he might not know what was the state of the business: he therefore related that the petition had been presented, read, and referred to the Secretary, who had now reported thereon.

Mr. STONE acknowledged he was not present when the petition was brought forward; but he knew that the business had been conducted in the manner stated by the gentleman from New Jersey, because the Secretary made mention of it in the report; but he thought it was not referred to him to report on the necessity of establishing a commission for the final determination on applications of this kind.

Mr. SMITH did not see any impropriety in conducting the business in this way; but if the gentleman would propose any other mode of proceeding in the business, he was ready to acquiesce.

On the question for referring the report to a select committee, it passed in the affirmative; and the following gentlemen were appointed a committee accordingly, viz: Messrs. AMES, STURGIS, STONE, GRIFFIN, and WYNKOOP.

Mr. WADSWORTH made the following motion: "That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House such information as he may have obtained respecting any difficulties which may have occurred in the execution of the several laws for the collecting duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, and on tonnage, and for regulating the coasting trade, and on report his opinion thereon."

WEDNESDAY, January 20.

JAMES MADISON and JOSIAH PARKER, from Virginia, appeared and took their seats.

SALE OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The report on the petition of Hannibal W. Dobbyn was called up for a second reading. It purported that the Secretary of the Treasury ought to be empowered to contract with the said H. W. Dobbyn, for the sale of a tract of land in the Western country, at a price not less than — per acre, nor less than fifty thousand acres, the whole to be taken up in one tract.

Mr. SCOTT was one of the committee to whom this petition had been referred, and he would inform the House that, on inquiring of the gentleman petitioning, he learned that the gentleman wished to purchase a larger quantity of land than would be convenient for him to pay for immediately; he is solicitous, therefore, of permission to purchase such a quantity, and to pay the price by instalments. He is willing to pay one-third down; one-third in seven years, and the remainder in twelve years; together with interest at six per cent. on the two-thirds unpaid, from the time of closing the contract. Now, in order to know if it is possible to let him contract upon these principles, he would move to amend the report to that effect. I will declare, said he, for my own part, that I am in favor of making as many of these contracts as possible; one-third of the purchase money paid down, and a settlement made on the spot, would be good security for the payment of the remainder; nor would this be all, for a contract made upon interest would amount to the extinguishment of so much of the public debt.

Mr. SMITH (of South Carolina) thought it would be best to postpone the consideration of the subject for the present. There was a difficulty had struck his mind, and perhaps it might deserve some consideration. The applicant is avowedly an alien; now, by the laws of this country, it is generally understood that aliens cannot hold real estate; they may hold it as trustees, or contrive some means to evade the law; but I conceive it would be a solecism in Government to encourage or countenance the holding of land by such a tenure. It ought also to be considered, that a committee is appointed who will probably report in a short time the plan of uniform naturalization. Now it would be impossible for the House, at this time, to judge whether an alien, holding lands in America, would be able to conform in all respects to such a law.

Mr. SHERMAN said he should be glad to be informed whether the petitioner intended coming here to settle.

Mr. SCOTT observed that the petitioner stated in his petition that he wished to become a citizen of the United States. With respect to the difficulty suggested by the gentleman from South Carolina, he apprehended it might be easily removed by inserting a clause in the bill requiring, as a condition, that the petitioner shall comply with the laws of the United States in that case; but there was urgent necessity of deciding speedily, inasmuch as the gentleman is waiting for an answer, and could not tarry long to receive it.

Mr. STONE said that if our lands were now valuable to foreigners, they would be so a month hence, and, therefore, they ought not to hurry on a contract of this nature, nor was it proper, in his opinion, to make a naturalization act to apply to an individual; the law for disposing of the lands ought to be general, that those who comply with the terms might be equally accommodated.

Mr. WHITE thought it of importance that the proposals of foreigners for the purchase of unappropriated lands ought to be attended to, especially of those who intend to become citizens. He looked upon it to be the policy of this country to encourage useful settlers amongst us. If the first applicants are successful, and met with no obstacles, it might induce others to come.

Mr. Boudinot observed that the business of selling lands was of considerable consequence; if it was properly managed, it might be a productive source for the extinguishment of the national debt; but much depended on the manner of settling out. If they went into a desultory mode of selling lands, they might do material injury. He wished a general and systematic plan might be adopted, which should not be receded from. He was, therefore, against the report, as he would be against any partial sale; but as for the amendment, he was pointedly against it. He observed, that there had been large sales already made, on terms known to a great part of the House; the payments for them were not yet made, but he believed they became due upon a contingent operation of Congress. He presumed that the House could not proceed understandingly in the business upon the information now in their possession. He believed it would be necessary before they proceeded, that some Executive officer should take it up in some systematic point of view, contemplating what had already been done, and what ought to take place hereafter. The Secretary of the Treasury appeared to him to be the most proper person. He, therefore, wished to refer the report to him; he might then converse with the gentleman on this particular application, and ascertain what might be most conducive to the general interest of the United States. He thought, however, that they should not undertake to make a sale to foreigners, on better terms, or more to suit their convenience, than was done to the citizens of America. He would, therefore, move to refer the report of the committee to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. Sedgwick did not see what particular good would result from committing the report to the Secretary of the Treasury; if it had been extended further, it would meet his idea, and perhaps the gentleman might be willing to go with him and extend the motion so as to direct the Secretary to report some general regulation for the distribution of those lands. He thought the Legislature totally incompetent to form contracts with individuals on this subject; it was difficult for so large a body to guard against impositions; besides, it would be a waste of the public time, which could be ill spared from more important subjects. He was decidedly opposed to selling lands, unless the whole of the purchase money was paid down. He would never consent to make individuals debtors to the Union, because it tended to weaken the hands of the Government. If they received but one-third of the payment, he should look upon the other two-thirds as relinquished.

Mr. Boudinot was willing to accommodate his motion to that proposed by Mr. Sedgwick.

Mr. PAGE owned that he had his doubts respecting the propriety of entering into a partial sale of the Western Territory; but when he considered the peculiar circumstances of the petitioner, he was induced to believe it proper to make some special provision; if it could be proper on any occasion whatsoever, it was certainly so on this. He had also some doubts with respect to the propriety of giving credit; but he thought they might be obviated by filling up the blank in the report with a large sum. He wished a contract could be entered into with the petitioner, because he feared if the present time was suffered to escape, they would never have another opportunity. He could press this observation further on the House, but the delicacy of the petitioner's situation forbade him; he hoped, therefore, they would agree to the report.

Mr. STONE thought that a land office ought to be opened where every one could be accommodated. He had no idea of giving preferences or enabling one man to make a better bargain than another. He had no doubt but the lands in the Western Territory would meet a ready sale upon his principles, and he believed there was reason to wish that Congress had never adopted any other; for it was thought there was little or nothing got by the contracts they had already made.

Mr. LEE wished the report to be agreed to, which he conceived it might be with safety. As to the term of credit it might be submitted to the discretion of the House after the blank was filled up; he thought it of great importance to sell and settle the vacant territory; it would add to the strength of the nation, and tend at the same time to extinguish the national debt.

If the House were not disposed to consider the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, it might be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, to use his discretion as circumstances should warrant.

Mr. SHERMAN thought the best way to manage this business, was to refer it to the Secretary of the Treasury, as was proposed. He said that the unappropriated land in the Western Territory was a great fund of wealth, and which, if properly disposed of, might extinguish the national debt, and be peopled by a valuable class of citizens; but if, from a mistaken policy, it was thrown away upon foreign adventurers or speculators, the public would get nothing for it, as had been the case heretofore, in the sale of large districts, where the expenses attending the surveys, &c. left very little profit to the United States. It is true, such measures may induce a number of foreigners to come among us; but then it ought to be remembered that such are generally persons of different education, manners, and customs, from the citizens of the Union, and not so likely to harmonize in a Republican Government, as might be wished; consequently, any considerable accession of this class of settlers might tend to disturb the harmony and tranquillity, and embarrass the operations of the Government. He thought it was worthy of inquiry, whether America stood in need of emigrants to people her territory. He supposed the notoriously rapid population of the present inhabitants was of itself sufficient for the purpose. It must have struck the observation of every gentleman, that they were daily throwing off vast numbers, and extending the settlements into that country which some gentlemen seemed to think could not be too early cultivated. But, nevertheless, he was willing to let foreigners come in gradually, and in the same way he was inclined to dispose of the lands. He thought it would be most judicious to lay off a district at a time, reserving some lots, which, with the increasing population of the surrounding ones, would increase in value, and ultimately these reserved lots would bring more into the Treasury than the others. He wished the business to go to the Secretary of the Treasury, because he supposed he had the best information respecting it.

Mr. BALDWIN.—If the application of every individual to purchase lands of the United States is to come before this House, we shall, I believe, have no leisure to attend to the more important parts of our duty. I think, Mr. Speaker, it must plainly appear, from the discussion which has now taken place, that we are not a proper body to enter into contracts with individuals. To perform acts of this nature with propriety, we ought to be possessed of the whole train of information on the subject; but it is pretty apparent that we are not fully acquainted with it.

There has been a difficulty suggested, whether by the common law, which is adopted in the several States, an alien can hold real estate in this country. If the common law excludes aliens from possessing lands in their own right, be it remembered that we have not adopted the common law, and therefore are free from its restraints.

He now called the attention of the House to the practice of the former Congress, showing that they referred similar applications to their Board of Treasury, who contracted for and sold the lands. If it was proper and convenient to give credit, the public did not give a patent for the land; they only gave an acknowledgment that they received so much on account, and an assurance that when the remainder of the purchase money should be paid, a proper and full conveyance of the property would be made on the part of the Government.

From these considerations, he was in favor of referring the business to the Secretary of the Treasury, that he might report a uniform system for the sale of these lands. But to refer the report of a committee of the House to any Executive officer appeared to him informal, and derogatory to their dignity.

Mr. PAGE had no objection to refer the subject generally to the Secretary of the Treasury; but he hoped the House would first decide upon the report, and then the petitioner might negotiate with the proper officer, and get his business finished.

The motion for referring the report to the Secretary of the Treasury was put and lost.

Mr. BALDWIN then moved that the report lie on the table, and that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report a uniform system for the sale of the vacant lands in the Western Territory.

Mr. LEE pressed the House to take order on the report; from the peculiar circumstances which attended the application, it was necessary to come to some immediate decision on this particular case, and he feared the act which gentlemen contemplated could not be passed upon for a very considerable length of time. If, however, the House would refer the report to the Secretary, he might insert a clause which would accommodate Mr. Dobbins, and be productive of great advantages. He thought it of high importance to encourage emigration into this country from all quarters of the world, but particularly from Europe.

Mr. SEDGWICK.—Whatever might be his opinion of the present application, and however desirous he might be to encourage the sale of the Western Territory, the present experiment had determined him to shut the door against all private applications to this House.

It is said, the person is a foreigner; that he lives at a distance, and must speedily complete his contract. These are reasons why we must contemplate his particular circumstances, and provide for a partial exertion in his favor. If these are arguments sufficient to induce the House to pay him exclusive attention, what would be said on the application of a fellow-citizen? Do gentlemen suppose that a foreigner is entitled to more peculiar regard than such a man? If they do not, we shall be perpetually employed in a menial business, and which we are greatly incompetent to. We shall most assuredly have to extend our sessions for the whole two years of our appointment; and our time and expenses will, perhaps, cost more than all we shall get by the sale of the land.

Mr. WAITE said, if a general system was now adopted, he should not think of a discrimination in favor of any one; but as that was not in existence, and as the necessity is pressing, he was induced to hope the House would make the special provision mentioned in the report. Indeed, he thought that the success of the present motion would be a negative to the application, and would throw such a discouragement in the way of similar offers, that he feared the United States would be considerable sufferers in the end. He thought an application for fifty thousand acres, which was really and speedily intended to be settled, ought not to be compared to the million acre purchases, which it was almost impracticable to settle.

A division of the question being called for, it was determined that the report lie on the table.

And then, that the Secretary of the Treasury report a uniform plan, &c.

The report of the Secretary of War on the petition of C. Merkle was called up for a second reading, and, after some consideration, it was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WABSWORTH, from the committee on the business respecting the Southern frontiers and Indian affairs, informed the House, he was ready to report; but this being a subject communicated by copy of which will be found in the Appendix at the end of this volume. The House having gone through the report, the Clerk was going on to read the bill which accompanied the same.

Mr. FITZSIMONS thought there was a degree of delicacy, not to say impropriety, in permitting the heads of departments to bring bills before the House. He thought it was sufficient for them to make reports of facts, with their opinions thereon, and leave the rest to the discretion of the Legislature. It would certainly be time enough for them to report bills when they were desired to do it.

Mr. PAGE moved to refer the report of the Postmaster to a select committee; but he was perfectly of opinion with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that no bill ought to be read in the House that did not originate with its leave.

The motion for referring the report to a select committee was carried, and Messrs. FITZSIMONS, GERRY, SUNNICKSON, PARKER, and STONE, were appointed.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the committee of conference on the unfinished business, reported, that the committee had agreed that the unfinished business of the last session, that had passed from the one House to the other, ought to be regarded as if it had not been passed upon by either.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the report respecting the Southwestern frontiers and Indian affairs.

The gallery was hereupon ordered to be cleared.

A Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES was received, accompanied with a copy of the act of the Legislature of Maryland, ratifying and adopting the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, proposed by Congress at the last session.

CENSUS OF THE UNION.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill providing for the actual enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, Mr. BALDWIN in the Chair.

Mr. MANISON observed, that they had now an opportunity of obtaining the most useful information for those who should hereafter be called upon to legislate for their country, if this bill was extended so as to embrace some other objects besides the bare enumeration of the inhabitants; it would enable them to adapt the public measures to the particular circumstances of the community. In order to know the various interests of the United States, it was necessary that the description of the several classes into which the community is divided should be accurately known. On this knowledge the Legislature might proceed to make a proper provision for the agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing interests, but without it they could never make their provisions in due proportion.

This kind of information, he observed, all Legislatures had wished for; but this kind of information had never been obtained in any country. He wished, therefore, to avail himself of the present opportunity of accomplishing so valuable a purpose. If the plan was pursued in taking every future census, it would give them an opportunity of marking the progress of the society, and distinguishing the growth of every interest. This would furnish ground for many useful calculations, and at the same time answer the purpose of a check on the officers who were employed to make the enumeration; forasmuch as the aggregate number is divided into parts, any imposition might be discovered with proportionable ease. If these ideas meet the approbation of the House, he hoped they would pass over the schedule in the second clause of the bill, and he would endeavor to prepare something to accomplish this object.

The committee hereupon agreed to pass over the part of the bill alluded to.

Mr. LIVERMORE moved to amend the last clause of the bill, by striking out all that related to the mode of compensating the Marshal and his assistants, which were specified sums, proportioned to the service, and to substitute a provision, authorizing the Marshal, or his assistants, to receive from every male white inhabitant above the age of twenty-one, five cents; and of the owner of every male slave, of like age, three cents; reserving, for his own use, four cents out of every five, and paying the other one cent to the Marshal. He thought this was an equitable tax, agreeable to the spirit of the Constitution; that it might be collected with safety and satisfaction; while, on the other hand, the mode proposed in the bill would be extremely inconvenient; it would draw a considerable sum out of the Treasury, which their present situation did not enable them to spare.

On the question this motion was lost.

The committee then, after making some small amendments, rose and reported progress.

UNFINISHED BUSINESS.

A message was received from the Senate, informing that they had adopted the report of the joint committee on the unfinished business, and requesting the concurrence of the House.

A motion was made to concur.

Mr. HARTLEY said, that the other day he had laid a motion on the table relative to this subject, and which he expected might have decided it. He had then given his opinion, that the unfinished business of the last session ought to progress from the stage in which it was left at the adjournment. Since that time, he had had the honor of being appointed, on the part of the House, a member of the Committee of Conference on the same question; but after hearing all that could be urged in favor of commencing the business de novo, he still retained his former sentiments; nor should he alter them unless some stronger arguments were adduced in support of the contrary doctrine. He would, on this occasion, trouble the House no further than just to express his idea of the difference between an adjournment and prorogation, for it was upon their similitude that gentlemen founded their idea of commencing business de novo. A prorogation of Parliament is the act of the first Magistrate in Great Britain, and by that act he dismisses all the business before Parliament. By an adjournment, which is the act of the Legislature, all the business remains in their possession. If they remain possessed of the business, they have a right, and they ought to take it up in the state in which it was at the time of adjournment. This continuance of business is much more beneficial to the Commonwealth, by expediting causes, by saving time, and consequently diminishing the expense. But even upon a prorogation of Parliament, the Houses have asserted their right to continue their bills in the state in which they were left.

[JANUARY, 1790.]

He did not think it was necessary to detain the House long upon this subject. He supposed that most of the gentlemen had made up their minds, and that a long investigation would not produce a single convert. For his part, he was opposed to the motion, and would vote against it.

Mr. JACKSON said that, on the conference, there was a majority of the committees of both Houses in favor of the report. After a long and full discussion, it appeared to them necessary that the business should be taken up de novo, because circumstances might occur during a recess, which would convince the House of the impropriety of a measure they had contemplated at their last session; an adjournment, therefore, amounts to the same thing as a prorogation. The opportunity the recess afforded them of consulting their constituents was the same in either case, and enabled them to form a more certain opinion with respect to the propriety of their measures, than any other thing could possibly do. Ought the Legislature, then, to be compelled to proceed with business they were certain was altogether impolitic and improper?

Mr. WHITE would not enter into a discussion of the subject; but he was satisfied that the decision was right, in order to prevent very great inconveniences. It never was a question with him, whether business should cease on an adjournment; he had always seen it practised in the Legislatures he had had the honor of serving in, and he always expected it would be so determined in every public body regardless of the opinion of their fellow-citizens.

Mr. HARTLEY denied that there was any similitude between a prorogation and an adjournment; the one was the will of the body upon which it acted, the other was an exterior force, which compelled submission. No gentleman could suppose that the Legislature of the United States was obliged to forego the business they had proceeded upon at the last session, nothing was to determine them but their own inclination. Now, as he was satisfied that it was more beneficial to the people, and more convenient to the Legislature, to proceed with the business of the former session, he should be against the report.

The question on concurring with the Senate was put, and carried in the affirmative—30 in favor, and 21 against it.

Mr. SMITH then laid the following on the table: Resolved, That it be established as a standing rule of the House, that every future adjournment of Congress, for more than — days, shall be considered as a termination of the session; and that at the next meeting the business depending at the time of such adjournment shall be taken up, unless it be commenced de novo.

Mr. BURKE said there was a bill of some consequence brought forward at the last session, which had been left in an unfinished state; and as the House seemed inclined to direct all such business to commence anew, he would beg leave to call upon them to appoint a committee for the purpose of securing literary property. He said that such a bill was very much wanted, as several gentlemen had lately published the fruits of their industry and application, and were every hour in danger of having them surreptitiously printed. He believed this was no unfounded surmise, for he had been informed that it had taken place in some instances already; he would mention one of them: Mr. Morse had published an American geography, illustrated with two sheet maps of the Southern and Northern States; these had been surreptitiously copied, and annexed to another publication, since the business was brought before the House at the last session; and the same gentleman is under apprehension that the whole work will be reprinted without his consent, unless a law was speedily passed to secure to him his copy-right.

Mr. WHITE wished the gentlemen would extend his motion to embrace the other objects intended to be provided for by the bill brought before the House at the last session.

Mr. BURKE said that he meant to provide for that in another resolution. He wished the first to be done immediately, and a short bill would be sufficient for the purpose, because it is almost as easy to ascertain literary as any other kind of property; whereas there is some difficulty in deciding upon improvements or inventions in the useful arts. This latter object, he apprehended, would occasion a good deal of discussion.

On the question, Mr. BURKE's motion was adopted, and a committee was appointed, consisting of Messrs. BURKE, HUNTINGTON, and CADWALLADER.

The same committee was also ordered to bring in a bill to promote the progress of useful arts, by securing to inventors the exclusive right of their discoveries.

TUESDAY, January 26.

NORTH CAROLINA.

The House resolved itself into a committee of the Whole on the bill for giving effect to the several acts therein mentioned, in respect to the State of North Carolina, Mr. BALDWIN in the Chair. After making several amendments to said bill, the committee rose, and reported the bill with the proposed amendments to the House. Being taken up, the amendments were severally agreed to, and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

CENSUS OF THE UNION.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill providing for the enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States. After making several amendments to said bill, the committee rose, and reported the bill with amendments to the House.

Whereupon, the bill with the proposed amendments was committed to a select committee, consisting of Messrs. FOSTER, GOODRICH, SHERMAN, LAWRENCE, SCHUREMAN, CLYMER, WHITE, SEKEY, SMITH, of South Carolina, BALDWIN, and MADISON.

REMISSION OF FINES.

Mr. AMES, from the committee to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the petition of C. Sadler, reported that provision ought to be made for the remission or mitigation of fines, penalties, and forfeitures, in certain cases.

The report being agreed to, it was referred to the same committee to bring in a bill accordingly.

Mr. AMES then presented the draught of a bill conformably to the order of the House.

FOREIGN INTERCOURSE.

The order of the day being called for, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to provide for the means of intercourse between the United States and foreign nations.

The bill authorized the President to draw for a sum not exceeding forty thousand dollars, to compensate the services of such officers as shall be sent abroad.

Mr. LIVERMORE moved to make this an annual appropriation, which he supposed was the intention of the committee who brought in the bill.

Mr. LIVERMORE's amendment was adopted.

Mr. LEE said, that, as the Constitution had vested in the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, the power of appointing ambassadors and other public ministers, he thought they ought to be equally interested in proportioning their salaries; and further, the President ought not to be empowered to draw money for those purposes without their advice and consent. He thought it would be well to determine whether the Constitution did not bind them to adopt this idea; and, in order to obtain the sense of the House on it, he would move to amend the clause by inserting the words "by and with the consent of the Senate," after the word "President."

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina.—It appears very clear, from the Constitution, that the Senate is connected with the President in the appointment of the officers noticed in this bill; but yet I do not presume it follows, as a matter of course, that they should be connected in apportioning their salaries, or drawing for the money. If it is not enjoined by the Constitution, it will be wrong to make such an arrangement, because it will diminish the responsibility of the Executive officer; it to the Executive officer, because we enable him to apportion the money among them. That gentleman, perhaps, did not attend to the bill, which provides expressly for the several grades of officers which the Constitution supposed, in the ordinary events, would be employed in superintending the interests of the United States at foreign Courts. If he had observed this, he would not suppose that the discretion of the President gave him an improper influence. These officers cannot be appointed to any situation, nor to any rank, but with the advice and consent of the Senate; no particular character can be selected by the President; therefore, I presume, the Senate have all the agency he wishes them to possess.

Mr. STONE understood that the President was at liberty to give any thing under nine thousand dollars to a minister plenipotentiary, or under five thousand to a resident, or three thousand to a chargé des affaires; if so, he was at liberty to pay them well or ill, as he should conceive they merited.

Mr. SEDGWICK.—When it is said that he shall not give a larger sum to a minister of the first grade, I presume that the payment of that particular sum will generally take place; but there are other circumstances attending this business which show the propriety of vesting the discretionary power in the President alone. Suppose a minister actually appointed, and some incidental business should arise, to occasion an actual expenditure of part of this money; for example, a minister at the Court of Prussia might find it necessary to remove some obstructions to his negotiations which had arisen at the Court of Russia; he would be obliged to apply to the President to authorize him to take measures for its prevention; but as money would be essentially necessary to effect the object, the President, though he approved of the idea of the minister, could do nothing without calling the Senate together, if it happened to be a recess; the business would not progress without an expense of more than, perhaps, double the sum that was necessary. To provide for cases of this kind was one of the objects the committee had in view; another was, that the person who touched the public money should be responsible for the expenditure. If the money is to be drawn by the President and Senate, so diffuse is the responsibility, as to be considerably weakened, if not altogether destroyed. These were the considerations that operated conclusively with me, and determined my judgment in favor of the bill as it stands.

Mr. LAWRENCE said, that there was a Constitutional necessity that the President, by and with the consent of the Senate, should appoint all the officers employed in foreign negotiations; the same necessity existed with respect to making treaties; but he did not conceive there was any Constitutional necessity for connecting the Senate with the President in apportioning the salaries; it was altogether in the power of the Legislature; they might apportion the salaries and fix them by law, if they thought it convenient, without encroaching upon the right of the President, or the President and Senate. If they could apportion themselves, they might authorize another body to do it; for he presumed, that neither the President, nor the President and Senate could consent for this power as a matter of right; the question then seemed to him to turn altogether upon the expediency, which was conceded to be in favor of the manner prescribed in the bill.

He remarked that the discretion of the President was confined within precise limits; he could not grant a larger salary to the officers than that prescribed in the bill; all that he could do was, therefore, to give less where he thought less would be sufficient, of which he conceived the President to be the proper judge.

Mr. STONE said, that gentleman had not replied to his observation, drawn from the Constitution; he had contended that a discretionary power in the hands of the President, to give a greater or less salary, would give him a greater influence than the Constitution had contemplated. The Constitution had given to the President the power of making treaties; but it must be done by and with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate. Do we then not depart from this principle, when we increase the agency of the President? If it is not contrary to the letter of the Constitution, I presume it is contrary to the principle of it, and we are bound to administer this system of Government upon its real principles. He believed that the President knew very well what would be a proper sum to give to every officer of the diplomatic corps, at all the Courts of Europe; but it did not follow that the Senate was without an equal knowledge; he would always attribute as much knowledge and integrity to that body as to the Chief Magistrate, and this he did on the principle of the Constitution, which supposed that there was equal safety and equal propriety in authorizing them to attend to such part of the public interest as was connected with the appointment of their servants employed in the intercourse between the United States and foreign Courts.

However, if this amendment was ever made, he should be against the bill, for two reasons; one, because it vested a discretionary power in the disposal of public money; and the other, because it incurred a perpetual expense, which he hoped at some day would be found to be unnecessary.

Mr. LAWRENCE did not apprehend the President would derive any influence from the power of drawing for the money necessary to pay the officers their salaries. He supposed, however, that it would be proper to limit the bill; because the circumstances of the Union might require a less sum perhaps than was contemplated at the present time.

Mr. STONE supposed, on a variety of occasions, that the President may wish for one person and the Senate for another. If the person approved by the President be rejected by the Senate, and their favorite employed, the President can make his situation so irksome, on account of his salary and the manner of payment, as to induce him to a voluntary resignation; or if he continues in office, he must change his disposition and be subservient to the Magistrate who can render him more easy in his employment. And can gentlemen say that this is not an influence? Now, if it is admitted to be but the smallest degree of influence, it is contrary to the principles of the Constitution, which interests the Senate equally with the President, in the whole business of negotiation. It is not to be apprehended that any danger will arise, during the present administration, from a trust of this nature; but he was not willing to establish a precedent which might operate hereafter to warrant the Executive in the exercise of an unconstitutional power.

Mr. SHERMAN.—The establishment of every treaty requires the voice of the Senate, as does the appointment of every officer for conducting the business. These two objects are expressly provided for in the Constitution, and they lead me to believe that the two bodies ought to act jointly in every transaction which respects the business of negotiation with foreign powers. But the bill provides for the President to do it alone, which is evidently a deviation from the apparent principle of the Constitution. And what do gentlemen urge as an argument to induce the committee to adopt their idea? Why, that the singleness of the officer who appropriates and disburses the public money, will insure a higher degree of responsibility than the mode recommended, at least by inference, by the Constitution. This argument would serve to prove, that a single person ought to exercise the powers of this House—consequently, it goes too far. There is something more required than responsibility in conducting treaties. The Constitution contemplates the united wisdom of the President and Senate, in order to make treaties for the benefit of the United States. The more wisdom there is employed, the greater security there is that the public business will be well done. As to the circumstance of drawing money out of the Treasury, it is of little consequence; but if a discretionary power is to be exercised in apportioning the salaries of the Ministers, there will be more security in connecting the Senate with the President.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina.—Gentlemen seem to confine their views to ministers employed in making treaties; but this is not all that the bill refers to. Many officers may be established in the diplomatic line without being concerned in making treaties. A minister may reside twenty years in France without being employed in the formation of any treaty whatever. A treaty may be negotiated without the intervention of any person in such a character; or a person may be employed distinct from him, as was the case in the late commercial treaty between France and Great Britain.

If the Constitution is involved in the present question, it is because the Senate are connected with the President in appointing the officer. But this doctrine would extend too far. The Senate are joined in the appointment of all superior officers; it would then follow as a consequence, that they ought to be concerned in affixing the salaries of them. It would apply, on the same principle, to the Secretary of the Treasury, and every other of the Heads of Departments, except the Judges; it would not extend to them, only because it requires that their salaries shall be permanent.

Another inconvenience would result: A Senator might be sent on an embassy, and being, from his situation in that body, in habits of intimacy with all the members of it, there would be danger of an improper allowance being granted to him. These objections, besides the probability of the President's being obliged to take some steps in the business during the recess of the Senate, show the necessity of vesting this discretionary power in the President alone, where gentlemen admit there is the greatest degree of responsibility. But the Constitution does not appear to trust that equal confidence in the Senate; for it gives the President the first and greatest influence. It is he who is to nominate the person, and the concurrence of the Senate may generally be expected to follow, as a matter of course. After giving to him this influence, little danger can be supposed to arise from vesting in him a discretionary power which is absolutely necessary, and for the proper exercise of which he is highly responsible.

Mr. SCOTT thought this measure appeared like an expedient, into the use of which they were falling for want of information. The very preamble which the committee had affixed to the bill warranted the idea. But he not only doubted the propriety of the expedient, but also whether the committee had a right to adopt it. He thought, however, it was a question well worthy of discussion, whether this House was well warranted to commit the appropriation of the money of the people of the United States to any particular body, whether it was the President alone, or the President and Senate combined. He thought, from the first view of the subject, that the voice of this House ought to be given to the disposition of every sum that goes out of the Treasury, and consequently he objected to the principle of the bill, and should vote against it, with or without the amendment. But if the bill must pass in its present form; if the apportionment of the several salaries was so great a secret as to elude the search of the House, and their information must continue in its present incomplete state, he should vote for that mode which appeared to give the greatest security; but he could not help believing the House was adequate to forming a complete provision on this head: he did not see what was to prevent them from running the routine of every Court in Europe, and apportioning, as they proceeded, the salaries of every grade of officers in the diplomatic corps, provided a different sum was necessary to be paid to ministers of equal rank at the Courts of France, Britain, and Genoa. He just mentioned his objection to the committee, to prepare them for a motion he intended to make when the Speaker resumed the Chair; which was, to recommit the bill to the Select Committee, in order to make special provision therein.

Mr. MADISON remarked, that the amendment offered by his colleague (Mr. LEE) would not decide the question for which it was intended; because the part of the bill into which he moved to have it inserted, only related to the power of the President to draw for the money, which was a thing totally distinct from apportionment, and which could be better performed by the President alone than connected with a large body.

Mr. LEE hereupon withdrew his motion, and having modified the whole clause of the bill, so as to embrace this question, "Whether the advice and consent of the Senate ought not to be had in the exercise of the discretionary power of apportioning the salaries?" proposed it in order to take the sense of the committee.

Mr. BENSON said, it would be wrong to blend the Senate with the President, in the exercise of an authority not jointly vested in them by the Constitution; and in any business whatever of an Executive nature, they had no right to do it any more than they had a right to associate a committee of this House with him. Now, he had not yet heard any gentleman say the Constitution expressly commanded the association moved for, and unless it was a command, he presumed they were not disposed to conform to it.

Mr. LEE informed the committee, that his motion was likewise intended to strike out the provision for contingent expenses; not that he thought them disallowable, but because he wished for a general bill providing for all the contingents of the Government.

Mr. SEDGWICK was as much opposed to the amendment in this form as any other. He would ever be in favor of singleness in the Executive, but especially when it was proposed to join with it a body that existed forever—for this was his idea of the Senate;—a body in which every member, from their long adherence thereto, learned to understand each other, and might, on any occasion, impede the progress of the other branch of the Government to the injury of the whole.

Mr. LEE said, these ministers were the joint servants of the President and Senate, and therefore ought to be equally under their care; they had a joint agency throughout, and therefore they ought to have the same in apportioning the compensation for their services.

Mr. LIVERMORE deemed the question of some importance, and therefore wished for time to consider it more fully. In order to obtain this, he moved the committee to rise and report progress. This motion obtained, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, January 27.

The engrossed bill for giving effect to the laws of the United States therein mentioned, in respect to the State of North Carolina, was read the third time and passed.

The bill for the remission and mitigation of fines, penalties, and forfeitures, was read a second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

FOREIGN INTERCOURSE.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. BALDWIN in the Chair, on the bill providing compensation for persons employed in the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations.

Mr. JACKSON.—The question before us, I presume, turns upon the propriety or impropriety of trusting the President alone, or the President and Senate, with a discretion in the disposition of the public money. It will be a matter of indifference to me which of these it is given to; but I am clear we have the power to give it to whom we please; we may even give it to a committee of this House, if we deem it expedient. But I am inclined to give it to neither. The appropriation of public money belongs, in a peculiar manner, to this House, and I am for retaining the power in our own hands. It was objected to this, that it would take up time; but I ask, for what were we sent here, but to watch over the public treasure? Gentlemen have said, that the President and Senate ought to have discretionary power in allowing salaries to our ministers abroad, because they are best informed what will be a proper compensation for the service which they have an exclusive right to order to be performed. I beg these gentlemen to look at the law passed last session, providing for commissioners, which commissioners, by the by, were, to all intents and purposes, officers of the diplomatic corps. Did this House view themselves as inadequate to say what would be a proper compensation for any gentleman the President might employ? No, sir; this House annexed a daily pay to the office, sufficient to procure good men. Why cannot the same be done at this time? Did the late Congress ever think of vesting such a discretionary power in their President? Certainly they did not. On what principle, then, is it contended that we should vest a discretionary power in an individual? Is it because it will take up our time? That is a poor excuse. It is out of our power to learn what is sufficient to maintain a minister at Paris, Madrid, Amsterdam, or London, or to discriminate between them and Genoa. If we are not possessed of full information on this head, cannot we acquire it of the proper officer? Will not the records of the late Congress elucidate the subject? Is it not fair to suppose, that what was sufficient three or four years ago, will be sufficient now; or if a difference is necessary, we can judge thereof as well as another? But any how, sir, I am clear for keeping the power of disbursing the public money in our own hands. If we adopt this bill now, on some future occasion we shall have to go further; and the principle that one is more responsible than many, will lead us to establish an arbitrary Government.

Mr. BOUNDINOT conceived that this difference of opinion rose from not attending fully to the subject-matter of the bill on the table. Gentlemen seemed to argue, that a discretionary power, with respect to the disbursement of the money granted in the bill, ought not to be vested in the President alone, because the Senate were connected with him in appointing the ministers among whom it was to be distributed. Now this objection, he thought, had been fully answered; therefore, he should make no further observations upon it. But the gentleman last up opposed this discretionary power altogether, whether vested in the President alone, or the President in conjunction with the Senate, because he supposes the House is competent to decide. Now, I conceive we are so circumstanced as not to be able to ascertain the proper sum required by every diplomatic officer who may be sent to the various Courts of Europe, and other quarters of the globe. Now, what power do we propose to vest in the President? Not that of giving away the public money in such a manner as he may please; but that for certain services he shall give a sum not exceeding a fixed amount; if he can get the business done for less than we suppose it deserves, it is a proper caution that we use to enable some one to reduce it. And who is so proper as the President? The gentleman says, we should fix the salaries of ministers at the different Courts. I much question the propriety of making such discrimination in a public act. I had rather refer it to the Executive Magistrate, under such restrictions and limitations as are provided in the bill.

Mr. SCOTT.—The subject in dispute I view but as a secondary consideration, Mr. Chairman. I think we ought first to determine upon the principle, whether a discretion can be given at all. This was the idea I suggested yesterday, and which has been again brought forward by the gentleman from Georgia. Now, to decide this question, we ought to inquire whether this power is of an Executive or Legislative nature? I think disposing of, or giving away sums of public money, is a Legislative, not an Executive act, and cannot be performed in any other way than with all the formalities of Legislative authority. This being my conception of the business, I shall take no notice of the propriety of giving it to the President, or to the President and Senate, because the same objection lies against both; it would be improper to give it to either, because we have not authority so to do; it being a Legislative transaction, we cannot put the part which depends upon us off our own shoulders, or on the shoulders of any other.

It has been said, we cannot fix the necessary sum for each, without making invidious distinctions between foreign nations. If that argument amounts to anything, it amounts to this, that all officers who are sent abroad must have an equal compensation; for if a discrimination is made in any manner, it amounts to a distinction, and must be invidious. But I cannot see a distinction in this light; we may have occasion for officers who have little to do; and it cannot be thought invidious that we do not pay them as much for doing less business, as we do others for doing more, or who are put to greater expenses in performing their duties.

It is said, that the proposition does not amount to an absolute appropriation by the President; but I differ from this opinion, and think that the power of reducing a certain sum enables him to fix the sum as much as if it had been in his discretion to raise it. It is, in either case, doing a complete Legislative act, which the Constitution has in part assigned to this House, and which we cannot dispose of to any man or body of men. If the committee join with me in this sentiment, they will concur in the rising of the committee, in order to have the bill recommitment to a select committee, to bring it in upon different principles.

Mr. SENECAWICK would have no objection to go through and fix the salaries in the manner some gentlemen wished; but he feared the House had not sufficient information for that purpose; but then, in the opinion of the gentleman last up, they were obliged to do it in this way. Now, he did not believe such a necessity existed; because he was satisfied, from the Constitution, and the construction put upon it by the House at the last session, that it was in the power of the Legislature to vest a discretionary authority in any proper body to dispose of specified sums for specific articles. How else could the business of the quartermasters' or commissaries' department be performed, when such business was required? But, though he did not approve of the gentleman's reasoning, he would vote for the rising of the committee, because he did not think they had sufficient information before them to warrant a decision.

Mr. SMITH.—If the doctrine of the gentleman is true, it is flagrantly violated at the last session, and that by the very act referred to by the gentleman from Georgia. He observed, that we fixed the pay of the commissioners who were sent to treat with the Creek Indians, at eight dollars per day. True, sir; but we did not limit the whole sum which should be given them; they were employed for a term in the discretion of the President; but besides, we appropriated forty thousand dollars to be expended in the business of Indian treaties, and that at discretion. The Senate, to be sure, reduced this sum to twenty thousand, which the House ultimately agreed to; but in the first instance we agreed to appropriate forty thousand. We certainly did not think we acted unconstitutionally at that time; and yet, all that we directed the expenditure of was but a seventh or eighth part of the amount.

From some papers before this House, but which it may be improper to notice very particularly, we find that instructions have been signed by the President alone, and he it was who drew the money for certain uses out of the Treasury; this is a precedent in favor of the bill as it now stands. The case referred to, respecting the practice of the late Congress, is not at all in point; the late Congress were invested with both Legislative and Executive powers, it was therefore they, and they only, who could accomplish the whole business.

Mr. JACKSON denied having said that Congress had not power to vest the President with a discretionary authority in the case now before the

[JANUARY, 1790.]

Foreign Intercourse.

[H. or R.]

House. On the contrary, he said, they could lodge it with him, or with the Senate and him combined; or, if they deemed it judicious, with a committee of this House. This was not the ground on which he rested his argument; he contended for the propriety of keeping the power of paying all the officers of the Government in their own hands. When it was not practicable to do so, then would it be time enough to grant a discretionary power to the President. Though the gentleman from Pennsylvania had carried his idea further, yet he would second his motion for the rising of the committee.

Mr. LAWRENCE hoped the committee would not rise for the purpose of recommitting the bill, unless they fixed upon the principles to guide the select committee in making alterations. He thought if the House attempted to fix the salaries, in the particular manner mentioned by the gentleman from Georgia, they would run the risk of doing an act of injustice with one hand, or lavishing away the public money with the other. He should therefore be against a measure which exposed them to so much danger. But the question of connecting the Senate with the President was more simple, and could be decided on the principle of expediency; for it appeared to be conceded, that the Constitution is not involved in the determination on this question, any more than it was last session, when the several Heads of Department were authorized to employ clerks, at a rate not exceeding five hundred dollars per annum. He therefore hoped the gentleman who moved the rising of the committee, would withdraw that motion until this question was determined.

Mr. BOURNOUT was against the committee's rising, because, if the ideas of the gentleman from Pennsylvania were in the bill, he should oppose them; therefore, as he disapproved of the end, he should object to the means of bringing it about.

Mr. SCOTT.—It is said, that my principle extends so far, that it would put it out of the power of Congress to grant any sum of money without a particular and specific appropriation; but I believe the principle does not extend to this degree. I know occasions, at times when the Legislature is not sitting, will present themselves, when money for secret services may be required; yet, in these cases, proof must be made of the expenses before they will be allowed in account, and any which are conceived to be improper will be rejected.

With respect to the act passed last session, to enable the President to hold treaties with the Indians, there certainly were twenty thousand dollars granted; but that part intended for the pay of officers was specially appropriated. The same is now contended for; if you send officers to Europe, let their salaries be ascertained, in justice both to the public and themselves.

As to the remark, that the number of days was not limited for which the commissioners were employed, I would just observe that they might, upon that idea, have been kept in pay seven years, or much longer than the money would last to pay them; but, in this case, the public would not be obliged to allow them a further sum, so that an argument of this kind proves too much, and therefore proves nothing.

It has been said, that we run the risk of making an improper allowance. We may make it too small; if that is the case, application can be made to the Legislature, who, we are to trust, will always be ready to do justice to every one of their officers. We have seen such applications already, then why should we doubt their being made in future? Upon the whole, my mind being convinced in the manner I have related, I cannot consent to withdraw my motion. Other gentlemen may be convinced of the propriety of contrary principles, with intentions equally good, or perhaps better; and be the event what it may, I am ready to submit to the decision of the House.

The question was now taken on the rising of the committee, and that being lost,

The question was put, on striking out of Mr. Lee's amendment, the words "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate;" this was carried in the affirmative.

Then the question on the amendment, as amended, was put and lost.

Mr. LAWRENCE proposed a clause for limiting the duration of the bill; this being agreed to, the committee rose and reported the bill, which was accepted by the House, as amended in committee, and the same was ordered to be engrossed.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 28.

FOREIGN INTERCOURSE.

The engrossed bill making compensation to persons employed in the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations, was read the third time.

Mr. SHERMAN observed, that by this bill forty thousand dollars were appropriated to uses with the propriety of which no gentleman seemed to be well acquainted. He thought the House could not be warranted in passing a bill disposing of so large a sum of money without further information on the subject. He therefore moved that the bill lie on the table.

Mr. AMES presented the petition of John Wait, praying to be reimbursed for articles furnished to soldiers during the late war.

Mr. PARTRIDGE moved to refer this petition to the Secretary of War.

Mr. LIVERMORE thought it not a proper subject for legislative interference, as the man had his remedy at common law.

Mr. AMES wished the subject considered; observing, that this person had lost his property by trusting soldiers, who had deserted after running in his debt. But there was money due from the public to such soldiers, for which the man had orders, certified by the officers commanding regiments. Now, he ought not to suffer for an act of kindness; and, perhaps, it was owing to the supposition he from time to time furnished these men with, that they did not desert at an earlier period.

H. OF R.]

Secretary of the Treasury's Report.

[JANUARY, 1790.]

He moved to take up the subject in a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LIVERMORE rather inclined to think, that the supplies furnished in this way were the cause of desertion; for the soldiers, after having got all they could in one place, might be disposed to try another; and perhaps these supplies afforded them the means of traveling.

The question, on referring it to a Committee of the Whole, was put and lost.

Mr. AMES thought the petitioner sustained sufficient hardship by the loss of his property; he therefore hoped that it might not be increased by a condemnation without a hearing.

Mr. LAWRENCE conceived the public were not entitled to benefit themselves by their own wrong. Perhaps there were considerable sums due to these soldiers at the time of their desertion; and perhaps this circumstance was the sole cause why they left the army, for it is often the case that soldiers do desert when they are ill paid. This consideration had so much weight in his mind, that he was inclined to hear the petitioner, and to do him justice.

Mr. WADSWORTH said, it was a constant practice in this country, and he believed in all others, that a soldier forfeited all his pay due at the time of his desertion. The sutlers, and all those who followed the army, know this circumstance well, and they supposed their profits enabled them to run the risk of all losses by desertion. The gentleman from New York knew this was the practice; and he would submit it to him, whether the man ought to have the pay of the deserters which he claimed. If this was the case, he presumed the principle would open a prospect to the House that would astonish them. The pay of every deserter would be claimed, upon one pretence or another, and there were not less than thirty thousand, or perhaps fifty thousand of this number.

Mr. LAWRENCE acknowledged the practice in our army, and every other, to be as stated by the gentleman; but he did not conceive it just in its operation. Is it proper, he inquired again, that any nation should be benefited by its own wrong? Or that it should take to itself the pay of the soldiers driven to desert from the breach of contract on the part of the Government?

The motion for commitment being lost, it was moved to reject the petition, and this was carried in the affirmative.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. AMES observed, that the subject of the Secretary's report, on the means of promoting public credit, is the order for this day; but when I consider the circumstances under which this order was entered into, I am inclined to wish for an extension of the time. It will be recollected that this report was ordered to be printed, in order that the members might have it in their hands for consideration; when this was done, it was expected that the printing would be more expeditiously executed than the event has demonstrated it could be, of consequence our time for deliberation has been curtailed; and those gentlemen who were against so early a day before, will think the present rather premature. In order to accommodate them, I shall move you a longer day than otherwise I might be disposed to do; and, if I am seconded, I move that the order of the day be postponed till next Monday week.

Mr. JACKSON.—The report of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Speaker, embraces subjects of the utmost magnitude, which ought not to be lightly taken up, or hastily concluded upon. It appears to me to contain two important objects, worthy of our most serious and indefatigable discussion. The first is, that all idea of discrimination among the public creditors, as original holders and transferees, ought to be done away; and on this head, I must own to you, sir, that I formerly coincided in something like the same opinion, but circumstances have occurred to make me almost a convert to the other.

Since this report has been read in this House, a spirit of havoc, speculation, and ruin, has arisen, and been cherished by people who had an access to and information of the report contained, that would have made a Hastings blush to have been connected with, though long inured to preying on the vitals of his fellow men. Three vessels, sir, have sailed within a fortnight from this port, freighted for speculation; they are intended to purchase up the State and other securities in the hands of the uninformed, though honest citizens of North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia. My soul rises indignant at the avaricious and immoral turpitude which so vile a conduct displays.

Then, sir, as to the other object of the report—the assumption of the State debts by the General Government—it is a question of delicacy as well as importance. The States ought to be consulted on this point; some of them may be against the measure; but surely it will be prudent in us to delay deciding upon a subject that may give umbrage to the community. For my part, before I decide, I should be glad to know the sentiments of the Legislature of the State from which I come, and whether it would, in their opinion, be more conducive to the general and particular interests of these United States, than retaining them on their present footing. I trust I am not singular on this point; for gentlemen desirous of deciding on full information, will not only wish for the sense of the Legislatures of the several States, but of every individual also.

Perhaps gentlemen of the neighboring States may think it proper to take up this business at an early day, because they can learn the desires of their constituents in a short time; but let those gentlemen consider for a moment that the distant States ought to have an equal opportunity, and we cannot hear the voice of Georgia in a week, nor in a month. I should therefore be as much in the dark on Monday week as I am at present; I would wish, if the postponement is intended to answer any valuable purpose, that it should be extended to a longer period. I think the first Monday in May would be sufficiently soon to enter upon it, and shall therefore move it. In this time the State Legislature may have convened, and be able to give us their sentiments on a subject in which they are so deeply concerned.

Treasury's Report.

Mr. BOUNDINOT agreed with the honorable gentleman who was last up, that this subject is a matter of the highest importance, and worthy of due deliberation; that speculation had risen to an alarming height; but this consideration bade him to be in favor of the only measure which could put a stop to the evil; that is, appreciating the public debt till the evidences in the hands of the creditors came to their proper value.

I also agree, said he, with the gentleman that it would be a desirable thing to have the sense of the State Legislatures, and every part of the community, because it would tend to elucidate the subject; but we should not be led by visionary pursuits to defer a business of this magnitude too long. I think we may go into a committee of the whole on Monday week, without coming to a final determination; but if it is put off for a long period, it will cause a still greater fluctuation in the market, and increase those circumstances which the honorable gentleman laments as injurious to the peace and happiness of the community. We had better, therefore, look the business in the face, take it into consideration, and go through it deliberately; but, at the same time, as expeditiously as the novelty of our circumstances will admit. In this way also we may acquire information, because we obtain more from listening to each other's sentiments, than we can procure from any other source. But if, after all, gentlemen should find themselves unprepared on Monday week, the business may be postponed to a further day. But I would by no means consent to lose sight of it for so long a period as from now till May.

Mr. JACKSON.—If the members of this body had known the plan in contemplation, and they had had an opportunity of consulting their constituents on the subject, then, I venture to say, this demon of speculation would not have extended its baleful influence over the remote parts of the Union. It arose and seized on us by surprise; advantages are taken without any warning, and such as cannot but exasperate. But, sir, waiving all these reflections, let us recollect that the State of North Carolina forms a part of this Union; this measure is to affect her, as well as the States who are represented on this floor. Shall we then proceed without them? Her citizens are indubitably as much concerned in the event as others, and will you bind her in a case of this importance, when she has not a single Representative within these walls? If no other consideration can induce gentlemen to defer this business, deference to a sister State who has so lately acceded to the Union ought. But, in addition to this, I contend that the State Legislatures ought to be consulted; and I declare myself, that I shall not know how to vote until I learn the sense of my constituents. If we consent to this proper and reasonable delay, our constituents will be prepared for our decisions, and a stop will be put to the speculation; or if any man burns his fingers, which I hope to God, with all the warmth of a feeling heart, they may, they will only have their own cupidity to blame. The people will then generally remain satisfied, under the general assurance, that Congress will pursue proper measures for the support of public credit, and little or no evil can be apprehended; but much substantial good may arise from a delay of a few months.

Mr. STONE had no objection to entering into a conversation on this subject on Monday week; but he did not expect the House would pretend to decide the momentous business till some time after. Many principles and terms in the report are entirely new, at least they have never yet appeared in the public papers as subjects of discussion, and of consequence the public mind has not been led to any satisfactory conclusion, by a systematic chain of reasoning; and he believed that much depended upon the unanimity with which these terms and principles are received, and what is the consent of the understanding of the community. He could wish to know particularly the opinion of the people of the State of Maryland, and, in general, the sentiments of the whole Continent; because that opinion might have a salutary influence upon the decision of the House.

He owned himself surprised, and not a little pained, to hear an idea expressed that they ought to be in a hurry about this business. If the propositions produced by the Secretary of the Treasury were to make the conditions of America better, or were to bring any great sums into our Treasury, he would be with the gentlemen, and vote for adopting them as soon as possible; but, in his opinion, this would not be accomplished until either the active resources of this country were larger, or the debts smaller. Then, why should we be in a hurry to adopt a plan that avowedly had for its object an increase of the national debt, without any addition to the means which the Government already possesses, and which she may apply more successfully, perhaps, to her own particular occasions.

Mr. SHERMAN hoped the business would be conducted in such a way as to be concluded before the end of the present session. As to obtaining the sense of the State Legislatures, he did not think that necessary. The people appointed the members of this House, and their situation enabled them to consult and judge better what was for the public good, than a number of distinct parts, void of relative information, and under the influence of local views. He supposed that Congress contained all the information necessary to determine this or any other national question. As to the first observation of the gentleman from Georgia, that speculations had been carried on to a great extent, he had only to observe, that this had been the case from the time when the public securities were first issued, and he supposed they would continue until the holders were satisfied with what was done to secure the payment.

As to the State debts, it was a subject which he apprehended would not be ultimately decided, till the sense of the people is generally known; and on this occasion, it might be well to be acquainted with the sense of the State Legislatures; he hoped, therefore, that it would be the case. But with regard to the foreign and domestic Continental debts, he did not hesitate to say, it was proper for Congress to take them into consideration as speedily as possible; for the sooner they are discussed, the sooner will the House make up their judgment thereon. He believed they were possessed of all the facts they could be possessed of, and therefore any great delay was improper. He was in favor of making the business the order of the day for Monday week.

Mr. HARTLEY.—If we mean to adhere to the principle we countenanced at the last session, we shall take up this business at an early day. If we mean to lose that confidence which the Government has already acquired, we shall consent, perhaps, to postpone it to the time moved for by the honorable gentleman from Georgia. But I trust we are decided in our endeavors to revive our drooping credit, and that we shall steadily and unweariedly pursue the open and liberal policy which is its firmest prop in those times of exigency which inevitably occur in the affairs of nations. Whether we go through and determine the great question of discrimination and all the other questions arising out of the Secretary's report, in a week or two, is not so material; but in order to be consistent with ourselves, in attaining the object we have contemplated, we ought undoubtedly to proceed to the investigation.

Mr. SEDGWICK.—I believe the House at present have not come to a conclusion in their own opinion, on the various circumstances which is necessary to be attended to in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, therefore, I think some delay is necessary; but it should be as early a day as we could act upon it understandingly. The ardent expectations of the people on this subject want no other demonstration than the numerous body of citizens assembled within these walls. And while the public expectation is kept thus alive, and in suspense, gentlemen cannot but suppose designs will be framed and prosecuted that may be injurious to the community. For, although I do not believe that speculation, to a certain degree, is baneful in its effects upon society, yet, when it is extended too far, it becomes a real evil, and requires the Administration to divert or suppress it. If the capital employed in merchandise is taken from that branch of the public interest, and employed in speculations no way useful in increasing the labor of the community, such speculation would be pernicious. The employment of the time of merchants in this way, in addition to the employment of their capital, is a serious and alarming circumstance. A spirit of gambling is of such evil tendency, that every legislative endeavor should be made to suppress it. From these considerations, I take it, Mr. Speaker, that there are two things very evident—first, that the postponement should be so long as to enable us to enter upon the task with understanding; and that this pernicious temper, or spirit of speculation, should be counteracted at as early a period as can possibly take place.

If the object of the gentleman from Georgia is to destroy this phrensy which has taken hold of men, and is so destructive of industry and morals, he should move for as early a day as should be consistent with his other principle; but by no means ought he to advocate a period so distant as the month of May.

Mr. GERRY.—I am a friend to the postponement, Mr. Speaker, though not for so long a time as the gentleman from Georgia proposes. It will be agreed, on all hands, that public credit is the main pillar on which this Government is to stand; but so embarrassed are our finances, that they require both time and consideration for their due arrangement. We have already done something towards attaining this object. We have organized a department in such a way as we judged most likely to bring the business into a system; and the Executive officer has selected a character, whom, it is presumable, he supposed was the person that best understood the subject of any citizen of the United States. This gentleman was called upon, expressly, by the House, at their last session, to consider this very important and extensive subject; he was called upon at a time when the period for his investigation was rather circumscribed, and himself but just seated in his office. But yet that gentleman has prepared and reported a plan for the support of public credit. Undoubtedly he has bestowed upon it all the attention in his power; but as we have had this report but a very few days in our hands, it therefore requires that we should have further time for consideration, as we are ultimately to decide thereon. But, in addition to this, there has been the accession of the State of North Carolina to the Union since, and she is not yet represented on this floor. I think, until her members arrive, it will be indelicate, if not unjust, to enter upon a question so momentous, and in which she has particularly interested herself, by a declaration with respect to the consolidation of the State debts.

With respect to the suppression of speculation, I do not conceive that possible, by either a longer or shorter postponement. Do any gentlemen expect, while we have a public debt, to prevent speculation in our funds? If they do, they expect to accomplish what never was effected by any nation, not in my opinion, ever will. But if they could accomplish it, they would do an injury to the community; for speculation gives a currency to property that would lie dormant; all public debts would hereafter be contracted on terms ruinous to the debtors. As to the policy of speculation, I doubt whether the speculations of foreigners in our funds is not rather advantageous than disadvantageous to the community. If we look abroad, and judge by comparative reasoning, we shall be led to believe that nations derive great advantages from being possessed of the money of foreigners; they not only endeavor to acquire it by direct, but also by indirect loans. During the late war, the Dutch held 40 or 50,000,000 sterling, in the funds of Great Britain, and she was sensible of the benefit. The speculations of individuals have, perhaps, been of the greatest advantage to those who held public securities, by giving a circulation to the certificates. Hence it has been thought that a public debt is a source of great emolument to a nation, by extending its capital, and enlarging the operations of productive industry.

When the war first commenced, France supposed, by detaching her colonies from Britain, she would be able to make her own terms with her. In the contest, Great Britain increased her national debt to an astonishing degree; and when all Europe expected to see her sink beneath the burden, she stood firm and fixed as ever, with an increase of strength. The influx of specie, after the peace, to purchase into her funds, furnished the means for the expansion of her commerce and manufactures, and rather made the Revolution an advantage than a disadvantage to her. However, be these matters as they may, we have not now to deliberate whether we shall acquire a national debt; it is already done, and we must either provide for the same, or declare our unwillingness or disability to do so; we do not mean to do either of the last, therefore we must prepare to do the first; but then it ought to be delayed until we are all prepared to enter upon it. From the consideration of the arrival of the members from North Carolina, I move to postpone it till the month of March.

Mr. JACKSON.—I know, sir, that there is, and will be, speculations in the funds of every nation possessed of public debt; but they are not such as the present report has given rise to, by the advantage those at the seat of Government obtained of learning the plan contemplated by the principal of the Treasury Department, before others had heard a word thereof. If we had either received this report privately, or not at in a large city, then, sir, none of these speculations would have arisen, because Congress could have devised means of diffusing the information so generally as to prevent any of its ill effects. Under these impressions, I am led to express my ardent wish to God, that we had been on the banks of the Susquehanna or Potomac, or at any place in the woods, and out of the neighborhood of a populous city; all my unsuspecting fellow-citizens might then have been warned of their danger, and guarded themselves against the machinations of the speculators. To some gentlemen, characters of this kind may appear to be of utility; but I, sir, view them in a different light; they are as rapacious wolves seeking whom they may devour, and preying upon the misfortunes of their fellow-men, taking an undue advantage of their necessities. This, sir, is the sentiment of my heart, and I will always use its language. I say, sir, whatever might be the happy effects of speculations in other countries, it has had the most unhappy and pernicious effects in this. Look at the gallant veteran, who nobly led your martial bands in the hour of extreme danger, whose patriotic soul acknowledged no other principle than that his life was the property of his country, and who evinced it by his repeated exposures to a vengeful enemy. See him deprived of those limbs which he sacrificed in your service! And behold his virtuous and tender wife sustaining him and his children in a wilderness, lonely, exposed to the arms of savages, where he and his family have been driven by this useful class of citizens, these speculators, who have drained from him the pittance which a grateful country had afforded him, in reward for his bravery and toils, and a long catalogue of merits. Nor is their insatiable avarice yet satisfied, while there remains a single class of citizens who retain the evidence of their demands upon the public; the State debts are to become an object for them to prey upon, until other citizens are driven into scenes of equal distress. Is it not the duty of the House to check this spirit of devastation? It most assuredly is. If, by the ill-timed promulgation of this report, we have laid the foundation for the calamity, ought we not to counteract it? This may be done by postponing the subject, until the sense of the State Legislatures is obtained with respect to their particular debts. Then these men may send off other vessels to countermand their former orders; and, perhaps, we may yet save the distant inhabitants from being plundered by these harpies.

With respect to the final settlements, I said before, and I feel now, that my mind is almost made up in favor of some discrimination, by reason of the speculation which has been carried on; but I wish for delay, if it be only for the sake of waiting the arrival of the Representatives of North Carolina, whose State has made an express declaration relative to the assumption of the State debts; her single voice, to be sure, ought not to govern the whole continent, but her sense ought to be declared; now, this cannot be obtained before April or May: Nor will the honest soldier or citizen, who fought your battles, or furnished you supplies, think hard of this short delay, when they are satisfied that it is the intention of Congress to provide for them as soon as the collected voice of the Union can be procured. And no man can think that the other class of certificate holders will have cause to complain, because no man supposes they will fall in price; but if they did, the advantageous bargains they have made by their procurement will bear such a diminution without doing a real injury; on the contrary, they will nevertheless make fortunes by the event.

Mr. BOWDWIN applauded every gentleman who spoke his sentiments freely; it was the performance of the intention with which they were sent here, and the most likely way of understanding a subject, and coming to an amicable and just conclusion thereupon. But he should be sorry if, on this occasion, the House should decide that speculations in the funds are violations of either the moral or political law. A Government hardly exists in which such speculation is disallowed; but it must, at the same time, be admitted, that every thing of this kind has proper bounds, which may be too small or too great. If you will not permit your creditor to transfer his debt, you deprive the commonwealth of a great part of her credit and capital: on the other hand, if speculation is carried on to such a degree, as to divert the funds of productive labor into the pursuit of visionary objects, or destroys them, the community clearly loses the use of so much of its capital, which is a considerable evil. He agreed with gentlemen, that the spirit of speculation had now risen to an alarming height; but the only way to prevent its future effect, is to give the public funds a degree of stability as soon as possible.

He agreed that it was a desirable thing, that every part of the Continent should be represented; but he did not think that the absence of North Carolina would warrant them to induce an accession of expense upon Massachusetts and all the other States. He did not, however, wish, or expect, that the decision would take place on Monday week; but he expected the members of the House would gain more understanding and information on the subject, from a conversation and exchange of sentiments on this floor, in a day, than they would by a month's study in their chambers.

Mr. PAGE wished to go into a Committee of the Whole upon the subject, pursuant to the order of the day, nor did he think it would be hurrying on the business improperly, because the report was so voluminous as to require a considerable length of time for consideration; and this might be commenced to-day, without a decision for some time after. He conceived the time of this day would be well spent in reading it; but if gentlemen were unprepared to enter upon it, he should not oppose a small delay; but to put it off till either March or May, would be highly improper; such a proceeding would give a fatal stab to our reviving credit. As to preventing the evils arising from speculation, that he believed was impossible, while mankind are at liberty to dispose of or acquire property. Nor did he think it could have been prevented by observing that secrecy which the gentleman from Georgia seems to approve; on the other hand, it might have given rise to a more extended and pernicious scheme of speculation; he hoped to see all the councils of this country conducted on open, undisguised, and liberal principles. He thought there was no room for the charge of surprise, because the House had manifested a disposition to exert itself in support of public credit at their last session; this had been noticed in the President's Speech, and in the Address of the House; and he conceived a long delay would imply that degree of neglect of their promise, which would give a deadly wound to future confidence.

Mr. SENEY said, in his opinion, the subject was too momentous, and of too great a magnitude to be hurried through the House; and that a sufficient length of time ought to be allowed for considering it in its various parts, in order to form a just conclusion on its merits. The members of this House may derive information from the discussion it may receive in the public prints, and from conversation with their fellow-citizens; whereas, if the House enter into a discussion before the subject is well understood, a great deal of time would be unnecessarily expended; he was therefore in favor of allowing a reasonable time for consideration, which he supposed to be about four or five weeks.

Mr. PAGE hoped, if the subject was postponed till a distant day, that the House would immediately adjourn to the same; for if the pretence of postponement, namely, to learn the sentiments of their fellow-citizens, was well-founded, it was their duty to go home and learn them.

Mr. SENEY said, that it was not his motive for postponing.

Mr. PAGE said, perhaps it was not; but it was an argument held out by other gentlemen, and if it was of any weight, the House ought to adjourn until they could know the voice of the Country. If the motion to a distant day prevail, he would move an adjournment for the same period; and this would be a more becoming measure than to continue sitting here, spending the public money, when they had little or nothing of importance to do; for almost all the business now before them derived its importance from the connexion it had with the public faith and honor.

Mr. SENEY.—If Congress had no other business, or that business was unimportant, I should not be unwilling to join in the adjournment, mentioned by the gentleman from Virginia; but as Congress has other important business before them, our time, I presume, can be well employed in completing it in the interval, which I wish to be allowed for considering this.

I believe that the resolution entered into by the House at their last session has been mistaken by gentlemen, who urge, that we stand pledged to take up this business, and make it the first object of our attention. I conceive, sir, the words of the resolution contain nothing of that import. All that we said was, that we considered an adequate provision for the support of the public credit as a matter of high importance to the nation; and authorized the Secretary to prepare a plan for that purpose. All this has been done; but it does not follow that we are to decide without time for deliberation.

Mr. GERRY said there was sufficient business before the Legislature to employ them, with all their industry, until the time he had mentioned for this business to be postponed. If some gentlemen are so well ascertained of the principles and consequences of the report, as to be able to decide at this time, they ought to extend an indulgence to the members of inferior capacity; for his part he did not yet comprehend the whole subject. He was not afraid of injuring the community by increasing the spirit of speculation, if such a spirit did injury at all; because the business was now carried on between speculator and speculator; it was they only who buy and sell certificates at the present day: he believed there were very few instances in which an original holder would now be inclined to sell; a little delay, therefore, can do no injury, but coming to a hasty and sudden conclusion may entail very considerable inconveniences on posterity.

Mr. PAGE called for a division on the question, and the first part, viz: that the House agree to postpone the order of the day, was carried in the affirmative. The first Monday in March was then taken, and the House divided—ayes 14, nays 38.

Mr. LEE then moved Monday fortnight; but this being decided out of order, inasmuch as after a division of the question has been called, and the first part put, it had been the practice of the House to preclude debate or amendment.

The question was then taken, on next Monday week, and carried in the affirmative.

RHODE ISLAND.

A Message from the President of the United States was received, communicating the act of Rhode Island for calling a convention: also a letter from the Governor of that State to the President, praying a further suspension of the impost, tonnage, and collection laws. These papers were referred to a committee, consisting of Messrs. BROWN, BENSON, and COLEB.

Mr. BURKE brought in a bill for securing to authors and proprietors an exclusive right to their respective writings.

Mr. WHITE moved that a committee be appointed to examine into the measures taken by Congress and the State of Virginia, respecting the lands reserved for the use of the officers and soldiers of the said State, on Continental and State establishments, in the session made by the said State to the United States, of the territory northwest of the river Ohio, and to report the same to the House.

Messrs. WHITE, MUEHLBERG, and SENEY, were appointed a committee accordingly.

The House took up Mr. SMITH's motion respecting the unfinished business, and, after some consideration, it was ordered to lie on the table.

FRIDAY, January 29.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Treasurer of the United States, enclosing accounts of expenditures and disbursements from the time of his coming into office to the 31st December last, which were read and referred to a Select Committee, consisting of Messrs. SMITH, of South Carolina, MOORE, SMITH, of Maryland, CLYMER, and VAN RENSSELAER.

A message was received from the Senate, informing the House that the Senate had passed a bill for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, to which they requested the concurrence of the House.

Mr. LIVERMORE moved that a committee be appointed to bring in a bill for the appropriation of such sum or sums of money as may be necessary for the civil list, and the incidental charges of the present year.

The motion was adopted, and Messrs. LIVERMORE, SYLVESTER, and LEE, were appointed.

ON REGULATING EXPORTS.

Mr. SEDGWICK wished to call the attention of the House to a plan for regulating the exports of the United States, in order to prevent those frauds which are practised at present, and which tend to depreciate the value of our staple commodities when introduced into other countries. Among the variety of articles which might become objects of such a regulation, there was the article of beef: this had been shipped abroad in some cases, in a state that injured the reputation of the United States. He thought the Government ought to extend its cares to objects of this importance. But it might be a question, whether the Constitution authorized the Government to do so. For his part, he thought the Constitution warranted the exercise of the power, under the clause giving to Congress the general power of regulating commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States. If the contrary sentiment prevailed, he supposed it would arise from the exception made to this power, by implication, in that article which declared that no State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any impost, or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws; and the nett produce of all such duties shall be for the use of the Treasury of the United States; and all such laws shall be subject to the revision or control of Congress. But he did not suppose any construction of this article would operate to defeat the measure he had in contemplation, whether another clause, namely, that prohibiting the National Government from laying any tax or duty on exports, extended so far is also doubtful: but he was of opinion that the business might be accomplished without laying any tax or duty thereon; but the former article seems to point out what was contemplated by the framers of the Constitution. The giving to Congress a controlling power, expressly over the State laws, supposes that they had a power existing in them for the same purpose. However, he would not enter into an investigation of the subject at this time, when his object was merely to bring it forward, in order to lie on the table for deliberation. He thereupon moved the following:

Resolved. That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill or bills to encourage the exports of the United States, and to guard against frauds in the same.

Laid on the table.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, introduced a resolution to this purport, that the Judges of the Supreme Court be directed to report to the House a plan for regulating the Processes in the Federal Courts, and the fees to the Clerks of the same.

Laid on the table.

A motion to take up, for the third reading, the bill providing the means of intercourse between the United States and foreign nations, was, after a short discussion, negatived.

MONDAY, February 1.

GEORGE GALE, from Maryland, appeared and took his seat.

The bill for defining and punishing certain crimes against the United States, was read a second time, and made the order of the day for Friday next.

ON SECURING COPY-RIGHTS.

The order of the day being called for, the House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for securing to authors and proprietors the copy-right of their works, Mr. BALDWIN in the Chair.

The bill was read and considered by paragraphs. The committee then rose and reported the same, with amendments. The motion for recommitment was withdrawn, and the House proceeded to consider the amendments; to all of which they agreed. It was then ordered that the bill be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

GRANTS OF LAND TO VIRGINIA.

Mr. WHITE, from the committee appointed to examine into the measures taken by Congress respecting lands granted by the State of Virginia for the troops of that State, brought in a report, which was read.

CESSION OF WESTERN LANDS.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, communicating a letter from the Governor of North Carolina, with a copy of the act of the State, ceding to the United States certain western lands therein described.

The Message, with the accompanying act, were read; and, on motion of Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, referred to a committee to report thereon. The following gentlemen were appointed accordingly: Messrs. CLYMER, TUCKER, GALE, MADISON, and MATHEWS.

SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. HARTLEY moved that a committee should be appointed to bring in a bill providing for a general system of bankruptcy in the United States.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, objected to the subject being taken up immediately. The present situation of the country, he conceived, was such as to render a general law on this subject a more intricate and perplexing business than the gentleman was aware of. He thought it most prudent to defer the business till the public debt should be funded, and banks established, without which it was difficult to conceive how arrangements could be made to facilitate the payment of debts, or the operation of such a law. He said that the insolvent acts in the several States would answer for the present.

Mr. HARTLEY said, the Constitution required that an act should be passed on the subject; but he did not wish to hurry it through the House at the present session. He was desirous, however, that some steps should be taken to show that Congress had the credit of the country in view.

Mr. SEDGWICK adduced similar observations to those of Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, and adhering to the present state of that country, from whence many of our precedents are derived, said, that since the adoption of their present system of bankruptcy, that nation had enjoyed a degree of tranquillity and domestic happiness unknown for a century before. But, recurring to the obvious difference in the circumstances of the two countries, with respect to commercial transactions within that Kingdom, he said, that, in his opinion, we were not at present prepared to go fully into the subject, or to adopt similar regulations; when there appeared to him to be a greater facility in recovering debts, he would not be backward in voting for the measure.

Mr. HARTLEY consented that the motion should lie on the table.

OF PROVING PUBLIC RECORDS FROM OTHER STATES.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, then recited the following clause, in the Constitution, viz: "Full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other State; and the Congress may, by general laws, prescribe the manner in which such acts, and proceedings shall be proved, and the effect thereof." and moved that a committee be appointed to bring in a bill or bills, pursuant thereto; this motion being adopted, the following gentlemen were appointed: Messrs. PAGE, JACKSON, and THATCHER.

INVALID PENSIONERS.

Mr. HENDER moved, that a committee be appointed to bring in a bill or bills, making provisions for the Invalid Pensioners of the United States; this being adopted, Messrs. HENDER, PARTRIDGE, and HATHORN, were appointed.

COMMITTEE OF ELECTIONS.

Mr. WHITE moved that a Committee of Elections be appointed; which consisted of Messrs. AMES, SHERMAN, BENSON, STONE, PAGE, WYNKOOP, and WHITE.

NORTH CAROLINA.

A message was received from the Senate, with a bill for giving effect to the laws of the United States, in the State of North Carolina, returned with amendments, in which the Senate requested the concurrence of the House; these amendments were agreed to, except one amendment only.

By the amendments of the Senate to the foregoing act, a clause is introduced for the purpose of further suspending the operation of the tonnage act, respecting the vessels belonging to Rhode Island, till the first day of April next.

TUESDAY, February 2.

THEOPHILUS BLAND, from Virginia, appeared and took his seat.

The engrossed bill for securing the copy-right of books to authors and proprietors, was read the third time; but, on motion, was recommitted to Messrs. BOUDINOT, SHERMAN, and SYLVESTER.

CENSUS OF THE UNION.

Mr. FOSTER, from the committee to whom was recommitment the bill providing for the enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, reported the bill with amendments; and the House proceeded to the consideration thereof.

Mr. LIVERMORE apprehended this plan was too extensive to be carried into operation, and divided the people into classes too minute to be readily ascertained. For example, many inhabitants of New Hampshire pursued two, three, or four occupations, but which was the principal one depended upon the season of the year or some other adventitious circumstance; some followed weaving in the Spring and Summer, but the making of shoes was the most predominant in the Fall and Winter; under what class are these people to be thrown, especially if they joined husbandry and carpenter's work to the rest? He was confident the distinction which the gentleman wished to make could not be performed. He was, therefore, against adding additional labor, and consequently, incurring additional expense, whether the work was executed or not. Besides this, he apprehended it would excite the jealousy of the people; they would suspect that Government was too particular, in order to learn their ability to bear the burden of direct or other taxes; and, under this idea, they may refuse to give the officer such a particular account as the law requires, by which means you expose him to great inconvenience and delay in the performance of his duty.

Mr. SEDGWICK understood, when the bill was recommitment, it was intended to specify every class of citizens, into which the community was divided, in order to ascertain the actual state of the society. Now, he had to ask, why it was not extended further? He thought the learned professions should be returned, as well as the others, and would furnish as grateful information as the return of any other. The state of society could be ascertained, perhaps, in some degree, from observing these proportions.

Mr. MADISON.—If the object to be attained by this particular enumeration be as important in the judgment of this House, as it appears to my mind, they will not suffer a small defect in the plan to defeat the whole. And I am very sensible, Mr. Speaker, that there will be more difficulty attendant on taking the census, in the way required by the Constitution, and which we are obliged to perform, than there will be in the additional trouble of making all the distinctions contemplated in the bill. The classes of people most troublesome to enumerate, in this schedule, are happily those resident in large towns, as the greatest number of artisans live in populous cities and compact settlements, where distinctions are made with great ease.

I take it, sir, that, in order to accommodate our laws to the real situation of our constituents, we ought to be acquainted with that situation. It may be impossible to ascertain it as far as I wish; but we may ascertain it so far as to be extremely useful, when we come to pass laws, affecting any particular description of people. If gentlemen have any doubts with respect to its utility, I cannot satisfy them in a better manner, than by referring them to the debates which took place upon the bills intended collaterally to benefit the agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing parts of the community. Did they not wish then to know the relative proportion of each, and the exact number of every division, in order that they might rest their arguments on facts, instead of assertions and conjectures? Will any gentleman pretend to doubt but our regulations would have been better accommodated to the real state of the society than they are? If our decisions had been influenced by actual returns, would they not have been varied, according as the one side or the other was more or less numerous? We should have given less encouragement in some instances, and more in others; but in every instance, we should have proceeded with more light and satisfaction.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. SEDGWICK) has asked, why the learned professions were not included? I have no objection to giving a column to the general body. I think the work would be rendered more complete by the addition, and if the decision of such a motion turned upon my voice, they shall be added. But it may nevertheless be observed, that in such a character they can never be objects of legislative attention or cognizance. As to those who are employed in teaching and inculcating the duties of religion, there may be some indecency in singling them out, as the General Government is proscribed from interfering, in any manner whatever, in matters respecting religion; and it may be thought to do this, in ascertaining who, and who are not ministers of the Gospel. Conceiving the extension of the plan to be useful, and not difficult, I hope it may meet the ready concurrence of this House.

Mr. PAGE thought this particular method of describing the people would occasion an alarm among them; they would suppose the Government intended something, by putting the Union to this additional expense, besides gratifying an idle curiosity; their purposes cannot be supposed the same as the historian's or philosopher's—they are statesmen, and all their measures are suspected of policy. If he had not heard the object so well explained on this floor, as one of the people, he might have been jealous of the attempt, as it could serve no real purpose, for he contended, if they were now acquainted with the minutiae, they would not be benefited by it. He hoped the business would be accomplished in some other way.

Mr. MADISON thought it was more likely that the people would suppose the information was required for its true object, namely, to know in what proportion to distribute the benefits resulting from an efficient General Government.

The schedules were now agreed to by the House, and the bill, with an alteration respecting the allowance to the Marshal of Maine, was ordered to be engrossed.

A message from the Senate, with the bill for giving effect to the laws of the United States in the State of North Carolina, was received; whereupon, the said bill was ordered to be enrolled, and Messrs. GILMAN and WHITE were appointed a committee for that purpose.

WEDNESDAY, February 3.

[FEBRUARY, 1790.]

Rule of Naturalization.

The engrossed bill for enumerating the inhabitants of the United States was read the third time, and then ordered to lie on the table.

RULE OF NATURALIZATION.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill establishing a uniform rule of Naturalization, Mr. BALDWIN in the Chair. The first clause enacted that all free white persons, who have, or who shall migrate into the United States, and shall give satisfactory proof, before a magistrate, by oath, that they intend to reside therein, and shall take an oath of allegiance, and shall have resided in the United States for one whole year, shall be entitled to all the rights of citizenship, except being capable of holding an office under the State or General Government, which capacity they are to acquire after a residence of two years more.

Mr. TUCKER moved to strike out the words "and shall have resided within the United States for one whole year;" because he conceived it the policy of America to enable foreigners to hold lands, in their own right, in less than one year; he had no objection to extending the term, entitling them to hold an office under Government, to three years. In short, the object of his motion was, to let aliens come in, take the oath, and hold lands without any residence at all.

Mr. HARTLEY said, he had no doubt of the policy of admitting aliens to the rights of citizenship; but he thought some security for their fidelity and allegiance was requisite besides the bare oath; that is, he thought an actual residence of such a length of time as would give a man an opportunity of esteeming the Government, from knowing its intrinsic value, was essentially necessary to assure us of a man's becoming a good citizen. The practice of almost every State in the Union countenanced a regulation of this nature; and perhaps it was owing to a wish of this kind, that the States had consented to give this power to the General Government. The terms of citizenship are made too cheap in some parts of the Union; to say, that a man shall be admitted to all the privileges of a citizen, without any residence at all, is what can hardly be expected.

The policy of the old nations of Europe has drawn a line between citizens and aliens: that policy has existed to our knowledge ever since the foundation of the Roman Empire; experience has proved its propriety, or we should have found some nation deviating from a regulation inimical to its welfare. From this it may be inferred, that we ought not to grant this privilege on terms so easy as is moved by the gentleman from South Carolina. If he had gone no further in his motion than to give aliens a right to purchase and hold lands, the objection would not have been so great; but if the words are stricken out that he has moved for, an alien will be entitled to join in the election of your officers at the first moment he put his foot on shore in America, when it is impossible, from the nature of things, that he can be qualified to exercise such a talent; but if it was presumable that he was qualified by a knowledge of the candidates, yet we have no hold upon his attachment to the Government.

Mr. SHERMAN thought that the interests of the State where the emigrant intended to reside ought to be consulted, as well as the interests of the General Government. He presumed it was intended by the Convention, who framed the Constitution, that Congress should have the power of naturalization, in order to prevent particular States receiving citizens, and forcing them upon others who would not have received them in any other manner. It was therefore meant to guard against an improper mode of naturalization, rather than foreigners should be received upon easier terms than those adopted by the several States. Now, the regulation provided for in this bill, entitles all free white persons, which includes emigrants, and even those who are likely to become chargeable. It certainly never would be undertaken by Congress to compel the States to receive and support this class of persons; it would therefore be necessary that some clause should be added to the bill to counteract such a general proposition.

Mr. PAGE was of opinion, that the policy of European nations and States respecting naturalization, did not apply to the situation of the United States. Bigotry and superstition, or a deep-rooted prejudice against the Government, laws, religion, or manners of neighboring nations had a weight in that policy, which cannot exist here, where a more liberal system ought to prevail. I think, said he, we shall be inconsistent with ourselves, if, after boasting of having opened an asylum for the oppressed of all nations, and established a Government which is the admiration of the world, we make the terms of admission to the full enjoyment of that asylum so hard as is now proposed. It is nothing to us, whether Jews or Roman Catholics settle amongst us; whether subjects of Kings, or citizens of free States wish to reside in the United States, they will find it their interest to be good citizens, and neither their religious nor political opinions can injure us, if we have good laws, well executed.

Mr. BOURNOR was against striking out the words, because he would rather choose to alter it from one year to two years, than to strike out all that respected the capacity of an alien to be elected into any office. He conceived, that after a person was admitted to the rights of citizenship, he ought to have them full and complete, and not be divested of any part.

Mr. WHITE noticed the inconvenience which would result from permitting an alien to all the rights of citizenship, merely upon his coming and taking an oath that he meant to reside in the United States. Foreign merchants and captains of vessels might by this means evade the additional duties laid on foreign vessels; he thought, therefore, if the words were struck out, that another clause ought to be added, depriving persons of the privilege of citizenship, who left the country and staid abroad for a given length of time.

Mr. LAWRENCE was of opinion, that Congress

had nothing more to do than point out the mode by which foreigners might become citizens. The Constitution had expressly said how long they should reside among us before they were admitted to seats in the Legislature; the propriety of annexing any additional qualifications is therefore much to be questioned. But this bill is not confined to the qualifications of the General Government only; it descends to those of the State Governments; it may be doubly questioned how far Congress has the power to declare what residence shall entitle an alien to the right of a seat in the State Legislatures.

The reason of admitting foreigners to the rights of citizenship among us is the encouragement of emigration, as we have a large tract of country to people. Now, he submitted to the sense of the committee, whether a term, so long as that prescribed in the bill, would not tend to restrain rather than encourage emigration? It has been said, that we ought not to admit them to vote at our elections. Will they settle amongst us? And is it not a principle that taxation and representation ought to go hand and hand? Shall we then restrain a man from having an agency in the disposal of his own money? It has also been observed, that persons might come and reside amongst us for some time, and then leave the country; he did not doubt that such might be the case, but it was not presumable, that after they had once taken an oath that they meant to reside here, and had become citizens, that they would return as soon as the occasion which required their absence had terminated.

Mr. MADISON.—When we are considering the advantages that may result from an easy mode of naturalization, we ought also to consider the cautions necessary to guard against abuses. It is no doubt very desirable that we should hold out as many inducements as possible for the worthy part of mankind to come and settle amongst us, and throw their fortunes into a common lot with ours. But why is this desirable? Not merely to swell the catalogue of people. No, sir, it is to increase the wealth and strength of the community; and those who acquire the rights of citizenship, without adding to the strength or wealth of the community, are not the people we are in want of. And what is proposed by the amendment is, that they shall take nothing more than an oath of fidelity, and declare their intention to reside in the United States. Under such terms, it was well observed by my colleague, aliens might acquire the right of citizenship, and return to the country from which they came, and evade the laws intended to encourage the commerce and industry of the real citizens and inhabitants of America, enjoying at the same time all the advantages of citizens and aliens.

I should be exceedingly sorry, sir, that our rule of naturalization excluded a single person of good fame that really meant to incorporate himself into our society; on the other hand, I do not wish that any man should acquire the privilege, but such as would be a real addition to the wealth or strength of the United States.

It may be a question of some nicety, how far we can make our law to admit an alien to the right of citizenship, step by step; but there is no doubt we may, and ought to require residence as an essential.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, thought some restraints proper, and that they would tend to raise the Government in the opinion of good men, who are desirous of emigrating; as for the privilege of electing, or being elected, he conceived a man ought to be some time in the country before he could pretend to exercise it. What could he know of the Government the moment he landed? Little or nothing: how then could he ascertain who was a proper person to legislate or judge of the laws? Certainly gentlemen would not pretend to bestow a privilege upon a man which he is incapable of using?

How far the Government may admit a man to the rights of citizenship by progression, is called in question. The Constitution vests in Congress the power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization; it is not various rules they have the power to make, but one complete uniform rule; now, is it one rule, if a man is admitted progressively? It is; because it is only part of a rule, that a man shall be entitled to certain privileges at the end of one year's residence. Another part is to give more in two years, and the whole is completed at the end of three years. The naturalization laws of Carolina proceed upon this plan: they do not there conceive it proper to give the complete right at once; they give citizenship for certain purposes at first, extending them afterwards as the person is fitted to receive them.

The intention of the present motion is, to enable foreigners to come here, purchase and hold lands; but this will go beyond what the mover has required, and therefore it will be better to draft a separate clause, admitting them to purchase and hold lands upon a qualified tenure and pre-emption right, than thus admit them at once to interfere in our politics. The quality of being a freeholder is requisite, in some States, to give a man a title to vote for corporation and parish officers. Now, if every emigrant who purchases a small lot, but for which perhaps he has not paid, becomes in a moment qualified to mingle in their parish or corporation politics, it is possible it may create great uneasiness in neighborhoods which have been long accustomed to live in peace and unity.

Mr. HARTLEY said, that the subject had employed his thoughts for some time, and that he had made up his mind in favor of requiring a term of residence. The experience of all nations, and the constitutions of most of the States, induced the same opinion. An alien has no right to hold lands in any country, and if they are admitted to do it in this, we are authorized to annex to it such conditions as we think proper. If they are unreasonable, they may defeat the object we have in view, but they have no right to complain; yet, considering the circumstances of this country, he was favorable to easy terms of admission, because, he thought, it might be some inducement to foreigners to come and settle among us. It has been remarked, that we must admit those whom we call citizens to all the rights of citizenship at once. This opinion, he presumed, was not well founded; the practice of this country in no instance warrants it. The constitutions of the several States admit aliens to the privilege of citizenship, step by step; they generally require a residence for a certain time, before they are admitted to vote at elections; some of them annex to it the condition of payment of taxes and other qualifications; but he believed none of the States render a foreigner capable of being elected to serve in a legislative capacity, without a probation of some years. This kind of exception is also contemplated in the Constitution of the United States. It is there required, that a person shall be so many years an inhabitant before he can be admitted to the trust of legislating for the society. He thought, therefore, that this part of the objection is not well supported.

With respect to the policy of striking out the words altogether from the clause, and requiring no residence before a man is admitted to the rights of election, the objections are obvious. If, at any time, a number of people emigrate into a seaport town; for example, from a neighboring colony into the State of New York, will they not, by taking the oath of allegiance, be able to decide the fate of an election contrary to the wishes and inclinations of the real citizens? And are gentlemen disposed to throw such an undue influence into the hands of foreigners? Besides, they will acquire a capacity of evading your revenue laws, intended for the encouragement of the citizens. I have mentioned this example, and might enumerate many others, to point out the impropriety of this policy; but presuming them to be within every gentleman's knowledge, I shall not enlarge upon it.

With respect to the propriety of enabling foreigners to acquire and hold lands on a qualified tenure, I have no objection to such a clause.

Mr. WHITE doubted whether the Constitution authorized Congress to say on what terms aliens or citizens should hold lands in the respective States; the power vested by the Constitution in Congress, respecting the subject now before the House, extends to nothing more than making a uniform rule of naturalization. After a person has once become a citizen, the power of Congress ceases to operate upon him; the rights and privileges of citizens in the several States belong to those States; but a citizen of one State is entitled to all the privileges and immunities of the citizens in the several States. Now, if any State in the Union should choose to prohibit its citizens from the privilege of holding real estate, without a residence of a greater number of years than should be thought proper by this House, they could do it, and no authority of the Government, he apprehended, could enforce an obedience to a regulation not warranted by the Constitution. So, in the case of elections, if the constitution of a particular sufficient for our views of having immaculate citizens, we should add censors, and banish the immoral from amongst us. Indeed, sir, I fear, if we go on as is proposed now, in the infancy of our Republic, we shall, in time, require a test of faith and politics, of every person who shall come into these States. As to any precautions against admitting strangers to vote at elections, though I think them of less importance than some gentlemen, I object not to them; but contend, that every man, upon coming into the States, and taking the oath of allegiance to the Government, and declaring his desire and intention of residing therein, ought to be enabled to purchase and hold lands, or we shall discourage many of the present inhabitants of Europe from becoming inhabitants of the United States.

Mr. LAWRENCE.—We are authorized to establish a uniform rule of naturalization; but what are the effects resulting from the admission of persons to citizenship is another concern, and depends upon the constitutions and laws of the States now in operation. I have therefore an objection to that part of the bill which respects the qualification of the members of the State Legislatures. But with respect to residence, before a man is admitted, I am of opinion with the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. PAGE;) at least it may be questioned whether any good can result from it, to compensate for the evil it may effect by restraining emigration.

The gentleman has said he would admit none but such as would add to the wealth or strength of the nation. Every person who comes among us must do one or the other; if he brings money; or other property with him, he evidently increases the general mass of wealth, and if he brings an able body, his labor will be productive of national wealth, and an addition to our domestic strength. Consequently, every person, rich or poor, must add to our wealth and strength, in a greater or less degree.

Whether there shall be any particular regulation with respect to the character of the man who is to be naturalized, will be an after consideration; but I think it will be sufficient that we are able, by laws, to restrain and regulate the conduct of an individual. Nor do I believe, sir, there is any just ground of apprehension that people will come to this city from Nova Scotia, or any other part of the world, in bodies of three or four thousand, to turn our elections, or interfere in our politics. And while I am free from these apprehensions, and suppose that the true policy of this country is to make the terms of admission easy, in order to people our country, I shall be against every measure which has a tendency to throw obstacles in the way.

Mr. TUCKER had no object in making his motion but to enable people to hold lands, who came from abroad to settle in the United States. He was otherwise satisfied with the clause, so far as it made residence a term of admission to the privilege of election; but there was a seeming contradiction in making them freeholders, and, at the same time, excluding them from the performance of duties annexed to that class of citizens. He thought the citizens had a right to require the performance of such duties by every person who was eligible under their State laws and Constitutions. Now, if the motion could be modified in any way to accomplish his object with consistency, he would cheerfully acquiesce therein.

As to the privilege of being elected to office, he was of opinion the term of three or four years was a term sufficiently short to acquire it in; it was a much easier method of obtaining citizenship, than was practised by other nations; neither would he object to any precaution being introduced into the bill that had a tendency to prevent the admission of bad men, if such precaution could be devised consistent with their Constitutional power, and could be carried into easy and safe execution. The mode mentioned by the gentleman from Georgia, of a recommendation by the grand jury, or district court, would throw a very great embarrassment into the way of an emigrant's becoming a citizen; but if some more eligible mode can be devised, of making the inhabitants of the United States a select society of good moral men, he was ready to agree to it, yet he almost despaired of its being accomplished.

He had no doubt the Government had a right to make the admission to citizenship progressive—the Constitution pointed out something of this kind, by the different ages and terms of residence they annexed to the right of holding a seat in this House and in the Senate, and of being chosen President. No inhabitant can become President of the United States, unless he has been an inhabitant fourteen years; which plainly infers that he might have been a citizen for other purposes, with a shorter residence. But it goes still further, it enables Congress to dictate the terms of citizenship to foreigners, and to prevent them from being admitted to the full exercise of the rights of citizenship by the General Government; because it declares that no other than a natural born citizen, or a citizen at the time of the adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the office of President.

With respect to their interference with the State Governments, he believed it to be improper; and hoped, therefore, that the bill would be confined solely to the objects of the General Government.

Mr. MADISON remarked, that the arguments had extended themselves beyond the simple question before the committee, and called into view matters of considerable importance, but of which, at this time, he did not mean to give an opinion. Whether residence is, or is not, a proper quality to be attached to a citizen, is the question? In his own mind, he had no doubt but residence was a proper pre-requisite, and he was prepared to decide in favor of it.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, hoped the question would not be put to-day, as he wished to reflect further on the subject. A variety of observations had been made, which merited the serious attention of the committee; he would suggest another. An alien in Great Britain is not permitted to inherit or hold real estate for his own use; consequently, a citizen of the United States, and a subject of Great Britain, would not be on an equal footing with respect to estates descended to them by inheritance. He thought this, and other weighty observations, would induce the House to postpone the subject till to-morrow.

Mr. SEDGWICK was against the indiscriminate admission of foreigners to the highest rights of human nature, upon terms so incompetent to secure the society from being overrun with the outcasts of Europe; besides, the policy of settling the vacant territory by emigration is of a doubtful nature. He believed, in the United States, the human species might be multiplied by a more eligible and convenient mode, than what seemed to be contemplated by the motion now before the committee. He was well satisfied for himself, that there existed no absolute necessity of peopling it in this way; and, if there was no absolute necessity, he thought Congress might use their discretion, and admit none but reputable and worthy characters; such only were fit for the society into which they were blended. The citizens of America preferred this country because it is to be preferred; the like principle he wished might be held by every man who came from Europe to reside here; but there was at least some grounds to fear the contrary; their sensations, impregnated with prejudices of education, acquired under monarchical and aristocratical Governments, may deprive them of that zest for pure republicanism, which is necessary in order to taste its beneficence with that gratitude which we feel on the occasion. Some kind of probation, as it has been termed, is absolutely requisite, to enable them to feel and be sensible of the blessing. Without that probation, he should be sorry to see them exercise a right which we have gloriously struggled to attain.

Mr. BURKE thought it of importance to fill the country with useful men, such as farmers, mechanics, and manufacturers, and, therefore, would hold out every encouragement to them to emigrate to America. This class he would receive on liberal terms; and he was satisfied there would be room enough for them, and for their posterity, for five hundred years to come. There was another class of men, whom he did not think useful, and he did not care what impediments were thrown in their way; such as your European merchants, and factors of merchants, who come with a view of remaining so long as will enable them to acquire a fortune, and then they will leave the country, and carry off all their property with them. These people injure us more than they do us good, and, except in this last sentiment, I can compare them to nothing but leeches. They stick to us until they get their fill of our best blood, and then they fall off and leave us. I look upon the privilege of an American citizen to be an honorable one, and it ought not to be thrown away upon such people. There is another class also that I would interdict, that is, the convicts and criminals which they pour out of British jails. I wish sincerely some mode could be adopted to prevent the importation of such; but that, perhaps, is not in our power; the introduction of them ought to be considered as a high misdemeanor.

Mr. STONE had no doubt but an alien might be admitted to the rights of citizenship, step by step; but he questioned the power of the House to say that a man shall be a citizen for certain purposes, as it respects the individual State Governments; he concluded that the laws and constitutions of the States, and the Constitution of the United States, would trace out the steps by which they should acquire certain degrees of citizenship. Congress may point out a uniform rule of naturalization; but cannot say what shall be the effect of that naturalization, as it respects the particular States. Congress cannot say that foreigners, naturalized under a general law, shall be entitled to privileges which the States withhold from native citizens.

Mr. BOURNOR.—An exchange of sentiment on this floor I find always tends to throw more light on a subject than is generally to be obtained in any other way. But, as the subject is not yet fully elucidated, I shall be in favor of letting it remain undecided till to-morrow, for which reason, I move the committee to rise.

This motion being put, the committee rose, and reported progress, after which the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 4.

RULE OF NATURALIZATION.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Naturalization bill. Mr. BALDWIN in the Chair.

Mr. TUCKER's motion was still before the committee.

The committee being about to take a question on the motion,

Mr. PAGE wished it delayed until he saw the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. BURKE) in his place.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said he believed the object of his colleague was nothing more than to let foreigners, on easy terms, be admitted to hold lands; that this object could be better effected by introducing a clause to that purpose, and he had no doubt but it would be equally satisfactory to his colleague.

Mr. GOODHUE was against the motion, because it made our citizenship too cheap; after it was decided against, he would move to make the term two years, instead of one, before an alien should be entitled to the privilege of a citizen.

Mr. STONE.—I would let the term of residence be long enough to accomplish two objects, before I would consent to admit a foreigner to have any thing to do with the politics of this country. First, that he should have an opportunity of knowing the circumstances of our Government, and in consequence thereof, shall have admitted the truth of the principles we hold. Second, that he shall have acquired a taste for this kind of Government. And in order that both these things may take place, in such a full manner as to make him worthy of admission into our society, I think a term of four or seven years ought to be required.

A foreigner who comes here is not desirous of interfering immediately with our politics; nor is it proper that he should. His emigration is governed by a different principle; he is desirous of obtaining and holding property. I should have no objection to his doing this, from the first moment he sets his foot on shore in America; but it appears to me, that we ought to be cautious how we admit emigrants to the other privileges of citizenship, and that for a reason not yet mentioned; perhaps it may allude to the next generation more than to this, because the present inhabitants, or most of them, have been engaged in a long, hazardous, and expensive war. They have been active in rearing up the present Government, and feel, perhaps, a laudable vanity in having effected what the most sanguine hardly dared to contemplate. There is no danger of these people losing what they so greatly esteem; but the admission of a great number of foreigners to all the places of Government, may tincture the system with the dregs of their former habits, and corrupt what we believe the most pure of all human institutions.

Mr. JACKSON.—It was observed yesterday, Mr. Chairman, that we could not modify or confine our terms of naturalization; that we could not admit an alien to the rights of citizenship progressively. I shall take the liberty of supporting the contrary doctrine, which I contend for, by a reference to the very accurate commentator on the laws of England, Justice Blackstone, l. 10. "Naturalization," says he, "cannot be performed but by an act of Parliament; for by this an alien is put in exactly the same state as if he had been born in the King's legiance, except only, that he is incapable, as well as a denizen, of being a member of the Privy Council, or Parliament, holding offices, grants, &c. No bill for naturalization can be received in either House of Parliament without such disabling clause in it." So that here we find, in that nation from which we derive most of our ideas on this subject, not only that citizens are made progressively, but that such a mode is absolutely necessary to be pursued in every act of Parliament for the naturalization of foreigners.

The same learned Judge then goes on to show the attempts that were made to introduce a general system of naturalization, and how they failed; and that, to this day, even of their meritorious naval and military characters, they make an exception, as to sitting in Parliament, &c. and holding grants of land from the Crown, within the Kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland. After this, I presume, it will not be contended that we cannot found our law, on the principle of a progressive and probational naturalization.

With respect to the approbation which a foreigner ought to acquire before he becomes a citizen, I am most clear, and as arguments enough have been used to place it in its strongest point of light, I will not trouble the committee with a repetition; but I believe it essentially necessary to render the American name as honorable as it merits.

Mr. LAWRENCE knew that Congress had power to say on what terms aliens should be admitted to the rights of citizenship, and affix any length of residence they thought proper; so that there was no occasion to bring a commentator on the English law to prove it to him. But he contended, that when the alien was admitted to the right of citizenship, that the law of the United States could not vary any of the effects of that citizenship in the State to which he belonged. He would elucidate this, by referring to the constitution and practice of this State. No person in New York can be naturalized but by an act of the Legislature; and when he is naturalized, there are certain rights which, perhaps, he cannot exercise, because he is not qualified according to the terms of the constitution. For example, he may not vote for Representatives in Assembly, unless he has resided six months in the State. Now, the act of Assembly naturalizing him, cannot bestow on him the right of voting, unless he either has before, or shall after, reside in the State for the term of six months. He contended, that the law of the United States could not alter the right of any man to vote after six months' residence in New York, provided he had conformed to the laws of the United States, in remaining one year, as the words, now moved to be struck out, seemed to imply. It is undoubtedly a question of policy, how long a person shall remain here before he is admitted to the rights of a citizen; but as a short term appeared to him to be best, he was for striking out the words proposed.

Mr. JACKSON understood the gentleman yesterday, as having advanced the argument to which he replied; but, if he was mistaken in regard to him, some other gentleman had made the observation, and the authority he adduced would serve to do away any doubts it might have given rise to.

Mr. HUNTINGTON.—The terms of the bill are too indefinite; they require the emigrant to take an oath that he intends to reside in the United States; but how long and for what purpose are not ascertained. He may determine to stay here until he accomplishes a particular object; and he may go into the most obscure part of the Union to take this oath. The community certainly will not be benefited by such emigrants, and therefore they ought not to be admitted to the privileges of citizenship. The mode of naturalization, pointed out in this bill, is much too easy. In the State to which I belong, said he, no person could be naturalized, but by an act of the Legislature; the same is the case in several of the other States, and in Britain. He never knew a good inhabitant, who wished to be admitted to the rights of citizenship, but what found this mode sufficiently easy. The term that an emigrant should reside ought to be sufficiently long to give him an opportunity of acquiring a knowledge of the principles of the Government, and of those who are most proper to administer it; otherwise he cannot exercise his privilege with any advantage to himself, or to the community. He therefore wished that the clause might be amended, in such a manner as to leave the naturalization of foreigners to the State Legislatures.

Mr. CLYMER was of opinion, that foreigners ought to be gradually admitted to the rights of citizens; and that a residence for a certain time should entitle them to hold property; but that the higher privileges of citizens, such as electing, or being elected into office, should require a longer term; permitting these rights to be assumed, and exercised at a shorter period, would not operate as any inducement to persons to emigrate; as the great object of emigration is generally with the view of procuring a more comfortable subsistence, or to better the circumstances of the individuals; the exercise of particular privileges was but a secondary consideration. He then observed, that it might be good policy to admit foreigners to purchase and hold lands in fee simple, without ever coming to America; it would, perhaps, facilitate the borrowing of money of Europeans, if they could take mortgages, and be secure. One State (Pennsylvania) had granted this liberty to aliens, and they have experienced no inconvenience therefrom; he wished Congress to pass a similar law, and was convinced it would not be dishonorable.

Mr. STONE gave it as his opinion that a person, who meant to qualify himself for becoming a citizen of the United States, ought to take the oath of residence and allegiance, within six months, and be thereupon entitled to hold property; but that he should not be capable of holding an office, or electing others into one, for seven years.

Mr. BURKE.—Unless some residence is required, it may be attended with confusion. In large cities, like Boston, New York, or Philadelphia, an election may be carried by the votes of the body of sailors who happened to be in port. If the French fleet was here at such a time, and a spirit of party strongly excited, perhaps one of the candidates might get the crews of every ship in the fleet, and after qualifying them, by taking an oath of no definite meaning, carry them up to the hustings, and place himself or his friend on this floor, contrary to the voice of nine-tenths of the city. Even a residence of one year is too short, it ought to be two, three, or four; but seven is too long. Indeed, the whole of this bill seems somehow objectionable; there are some cases also omitted, which may show the necessity of recommitting it.

The case of the children of American parents born abroad ought to be provided for, as was done in the case of English parents, in the 12th year of William III. There are several other cases that ought to be likewise attended to.

Mr. PAGE had given his sentiments yesterday, and was clearly against throwing any obstacles in the way of good men desirous of becoming citizens.

Mr. LEE did not approve of the motion; but was in favor of as short a term as would be consistent, because he apprehended it would tend considerably to encourage emigration.

Mr. SENEY thought Congress had no right to intermeddle with the regulations of the several States, while prescribing a rule of naturalization. If they were disposed to say that two, three, or four years' residence in the United States was proper, before an alien should be eligible to an office under the General Government, they might; but after they have admitted a foreigner to citizenship, he did not believe they were authorized to except him, for two years more, from being capable of election, or appointment to any office, Legislative, Executive, or Judicial, under the State Governments, provided the State laws or constitutions admit him at a shorter period. Nor did he believe Congress could admit foreigners to such privilege so early as two years in States requiring a longer term of probation. He had, however, no objection to foreigners being admitted to hold property, without any previous residence; but he did not like the idea of admitting them to a participation in the Government, without a residence sufficiently long to enable them to understand their duty. As the bill was not satisfactory to his mind, in its present form, he would vote for a recommitment.

Mr. JACKSON had an objection to any persons holding land in the United States without residence, and an intention of becoming a citizen; under such a regulation the whole Western Territory might be purchased by the inhabitants of England, France, or other foreign nations; the landholders might combine, and send out a large tenantry, and have thereby such an interference in the Government as to overset the principles upon which it is established. It will be totally subversive of the old established doctrine, that allegiance and land go together; a person owing no allegiance to a Sovereign, ought not to hold lands under its protection, because he cannot be called upon and obliged to give that support which invasion or insurrection may render necessary. But, with respect to residence and probation, before an alien is entitled to the privilege of voting at elections, I am very clear it is necessary; unless gentlemen mean to render the rank of an American citizen the maygame of the world. Shall stories be told of our citizenship, such as I have read in the Pennsylvania Magazine of the citizenship there? If my memory serves me right, the story runs, that at a contested election in Philadelphia, when parties ran very high, and no stone was left unturned, on either side, to carry the election, most of the ships in the harbor were cleared of their crews, who, ranged under the masters and owners, came before a Magistrate, took the oath of allegiance, and paid half a crown tax to the collector, as the Constitution required, then went and voted, and decided the contest of the day. On the return of one of the vessels, whose crew had been employed in the affair of the election, they fell in with a shoal of porpoises off Cape Henlopen. "Ha!" said one of them, "what merry company have we got here! I wonder where they are going so cheerfully?" "Going," replied one of his comrades, "why, going to Philadelphia, to be sure, to pay taxes, and vote for Assemblymen!" I hope, Mr. Chairman, we have more respect for our situations, as citizens, than to expose ourselves to the taunts and jeers of a deriding world, by making that situation too cheap.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, admitted the propriety of recommitting the bill; but he wished some principles to be first established for the direction of the committee; for, at present, he was at a loss to conceive what was the prevailing opinion. Many gentlemen had suggested new ideas, which occasioned new difficulties; he hoped they would settle and remove some of them before they rose. The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SENEY) has observed, that we have no right to declare upon what terms an alien shall be admitted to the offices of the State Governments; this the same argument extends also to the voters. This opinion opens a new field of argument, and entirely changes the system; it ought, therefore, to be decided. For his part, he was of opinion, that an uniform rule of naturalization would extend to the whole Continent, and decide the right of a foreigner to be admitted to elect, or be elected, in any of the States.

He would suggest another idea for consideration. What is to become of those inchoate rights of citizenship, which are not yet completed? Can the Government, by an ex post facto law, deprive an alien of the advantage of such an inchoate right? Mr. SENEY.—The gentleman last up has different ideas of the jurisdiction of the United States from me. He believes we have not only the power of prescribing the qualifications of our own officers, but the officers of every State in the Union; but I conceive, with respect to the latter, we have nothing to do. We can go no further than to prescribe the rule by which it can be determined who are, and who are not citizens; but we cannot say they shall be entitled to privileges in the different States which native citizens are not entitled to, until they have performed the conditions annexed thereto.

Mr. BURKE said, no person ought to be permitted to inherit by descent, in America, unless the same privilege was reciprocated by other nations; perhaps this point would be properly settled by treaty, and it would be well to introduce a visionary clause to this effect. He was also in favor of admitting foreigners to hold lands on easy terms, if they would come to reside among us; and here he would take an opportunity of doing justice to some of them, as it might be supposed, from what had fallen from various parts of the House, that foreigners, educated under a Monarchy, were inimical to the pure principles of Republicanism. He was convinced that this doctrine was untrue, because he had often remarked that foreigners made as good citizens of Republics as the natives themselves. Frenchmen, brought up under an absolute Monarchy, evinced their love of liberty in the late arduous struggle; many of them are now worthy citizens, who esteem and venerate the principles of our Revolution. Emigrants from England, Ireland, and Scotland, have not been behind any in the love of this country; so there is but little occasion for the jealousy which appears to be entertained for the preservation of the Government.

Mr. CLYMER observed, that though Congress have authority to make a uniform rule of naturalization throughout the States, yet it was not true that it would apply with equal advantage to them all; that it might be proper every where, indeed, that aliens should be admitted, early, to the inferior rights of citizens, but that it would be unsuitable they should be admitted to the higher privileges at the same period, in all the States, however differently circumstanced. In States newly formed, it might be useful to fix a short period; but in the old States, fully peopled, he did not think the longest which had been mentioned too great; for this reason he thought the power of naturalizing should be referred to the States, to make such provision as they pleased, and therefore approved the recommendation; but not till the House had passed on to a following clause, which respects the objects of the bill. When that came under consideration, he thought it might be both a generous and wise policy to make an easy way to the return of those, with exception to one character only, who had been once citizens of the United States, and who would, many of them, gladly again become so; he meant the refugees, who were adding to the wealth and strength of a Power no ways friendly to us, and are actually injuring some of the States by the rivalry they create in the fisheries.

Mr. TUCKER thought the bill must be recommitment; but he did not wish it done till the sense of the House was known on some of the various points that had presented themselves during the debate. With respect to the latter part of the first clause, he agreed with the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. SENEY,) that we ought to provide a rule of naturalization, without attempting to define the particular privileges acquired thereby under the State Governments. By the Constitution of the United States, the electors of the House of Representatives are to have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislatures. He presumed it was to be left to the discretion of the State constitutions, who were to be the electors of the State Legislatures, and therefore the General Government had no right to interfere therein. The motion he had made for striking out the words, "and shall have resided within the United States for one whole year," not coming up to, or sufficiently explaining his wishes, he would withdraw, and propose to new model the clause, so as to allow aliens to be admitted to so much of the rights of citizenship as to be able to hold lands, upon taking the necessary oaths; but not to elect, or be elected, to any office under the General Government, until they had resided three years within the United States; with a proviso, that the titles to real estates should not be valid, unless they continued to reside for the term of three years in America.

Mr. HARTLEY observed, that the subject was entirely new, and that the committee had no positive mode to enable them to decide; the practice of England, and the regulations of the several States, threw some light on the subject, but not sufficient to enable them to discover what plan of naturalization would be acceptable under a Government like this. Some gentlemen had objected to the bill, without attending to all its parts, for a remedy was therein provided for some of the inconveniences that had been suggested. It was said, the bill ought to extend to the exclusion of those who had trespassed against the laws of foreign nations, or been convicted of a capital offence in any foreign kingdom; the last clause contains a proviso to that effect, and he had another clause ready to present, providing for the children of American citizens born out of the United States.

Mr. LIVERMORE thought the bill very imperfect, and that the committee ought to rise, and recommend it to be referred to a select committee; observing, that it was extremely difficult for fifty or sixty persons to arrange and make a system of a variety of motions and observations that had been brought forward.

Mr. SEDGWICK was in favor of the committee rising. He did not recollect an instance wherein gentlemen's ideas had been so various as on this occasion; motions and observations were piled on the back of each other, and the committee, from the want of understanding the subject, had involved themselves in a wilderness of matter, out of which he saw no way to extricate themselves but by the rising of the committee.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, as a member of the Committee of the Whole, wished to take his share of the blame for not understanding the subject; but he thought, nevertheless, that some of the points suggested had been so fully discussed, as to enable them to decide, particularly with respect to residence.

Mr. PAGE did not approve of the rising of the committee, until they had expressed their sense on the point they had had so long under consideration.

Mr. SYLVESTER thought it neither for the honor nor interest of the United States to admit aliens to the rights of citizenship indiscriminately; he was clearly in favor of a term of probation, and that their good behaviour should be vouched for. He suggested the idea of lodging the power of admitting foreigners to be naturalized in the District Judges.

Mr. SEDGWICK meant to blame no gentleman, and hoped no gentleman understood him to intend such a thing. He conceived himself as much in fault as any member, because he had not yet turned his attention so seriously to the subject as he ought.

On the question being put, the committee rose and reported, and the bill was recommitted to a committee of ten.

CENSUS BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill for the actual enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, when a motion was made to recommit this bill.

Mr. SEDGWICK adverted to the present rate of representation of the several States in Congress, in which the most palpable inequality reigned.

He observed, that an enumeration, such as would be competent to equalize the representation, ought to be made previous to the next election. This, he said, the people expected, on the title of right and justice; and the Constitution had provided for it; nor will the people, who think themselves not fully represented, be content without enjoying that weight and influence in the Legislature to which they conceive they are entitled. He then read the proposition, which he intended to offer as a clause to be incorporated in the bill, when it shall be committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JACKSON said there would not be sufficient time allowed to complete the enumeration; and objected to it, particularly as it proposed the President of the United States shall determine the census of the inhabitants, from the returns he may receive from the Marshals and the ratio of representation on those returns.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said that he objected to the proposition, as he thought it did not allow a sufficient time for the returns to be made. He then mentioned the several periods that must probably elapse, before the business of enumeration could be completed. From which it appeared, that the object of the motion cannot be effected, in such a manner as to make any alteration in the next election proper.

Mr. WHITE pointed out the difficulties that would result from such a measure, as some of the States had passed laws to regulate the time of elections; and, he presumed, that the Legislature never would delegate to any man, or men, the power of determining the ratio of representation.

Mr. LAWRENCE said he had no objection to recommit the bill. It appeared to him that the rule of representation ought to be determined, previous to ascertaining the number of inhabitants, as in all probability, that rule would be adopted with less prejudice and partiality, while the contingencies that may affect it are not known.

Mr. JACKSON said he thought this suggestion was an artifice, covered, however, with too thin a veil not to be seen through, it was too unsubstantial to support itself; that point has been already settled by the Constitution. He recited the clause that particularly pointed out the number of Representatives each State is entitled to elect, previous to any actual enumeration; the Constitution, therefore, plainly directs an enumeration before the ratio of a future representation shall be settled.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said that the ratio of representation was already proposed by Congress, in the amendments sent out to the Legislatures. He, therefore, hoped that nothing would be done to impede the progress and ratification of those amendments.

Mr. SEDGWICK said that when he introduced the proposition, he supposed it was founded upon such fair and equal principles that he did not anticipate the smallest objection would have been made by any gentleman whatever. The proposition was simply this, that justice should be done; that a more equal representation should be attempted and effected. If inequalities do exist, and it is very evident they do, can any gentleman object to a remedy?

The motion for recommitting the bill to a Committee of the Whole was put, and carried in the affirmative.

FRIDAY, February 5.

REMISSION OF FINES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to provide for the remission or mitigation of fines, forfeitures, and penalties, in certain cases, Mr. BALDWIN in the Chair.

The clause provides:

"That whenever any person liable to fine or penalty, or subject to forfeiture, shall petition before judgment is rendered, and offer to confess judgment for the same, the judge, with the district attorney, or marshal, may inquire, in a summary manner, into the truth of the allegations in the petition, and if it appears to them that the fine, &c., was incurred inadvertently, or by casualty, and without fraud, or intent to evade the law, the same may be admitted; saving to the informant, or person seizing the property, the right they have acquired."

Mr. GOODHUE said, this law would put the man in a worse situation than if left to his chance upon the action; for if he confessed judgment, he must lose half his property. It was common, he believed, to extend mercy after conviction.

Mr. LIVERMORE moved to strike out the words, "offering to confess judgment for the same."

Mr. AMES said, he was indifferent whether the words in the clause were retained or struck out. He wished, however, that the principles of the bill might be well understood. That a strict adherence to rule, even if it should sometimes be attended with rigor, he conceived to be a less evil than a lax mode of executing the laws; that it may be considered as a great grievance to have frequent recourse to qualified interpretations of the laws. With respect to the revenue, it must strike every person, that a certain rule ought to be maintained in all possible cases; nevertheless, fines, penalties, and forfeitures, may be incurred in such a manner as may entitle to relief. The object of the bill, he said, was to grant such relief with the least risk of injuring the revenue, and in such a mode, as that the person offending may receive it as soon as possible.

Mr. SEDGWICK was in favor of the motion, and endeavored to demonstrate the injustice of requiring a confession previous to granting relief, as it would violate the feelings of a person conscious of his innocence, besides subjecting him, inevitably, to the forfeiture of one-half of his property.

Mr. BURKE was for striking out the whole clause; because it held up a temptation for a man to accuse himself, which was contrary to every principle of law. It put him in mind of a story of the notorious Judge Jeffries, who advised a man to confess himself guilty, and to throw himself upon the mercy of the court, and afterwards hung him.

Mr. WADSWORTH stated a case to show that this law would render the situation of persons designed to be relieved by it much worse than it now is; and would eventually tend to injure the coasting trade.

Mr. LAWRENCE observed, that persons absolutely violating the laws, whether intentionally or through ignorance, would, by process of law, as it now stands, be precluded from all relief. He insisted, therefore, that it was necessary this confession of judgment should accompany the application for relief, in cases designed to be provided for by the bill; without this confession the application would appear to be absurd. He was, therefore, opposed to the motion for striking out the words.

Mr. SMITH thought that the person would be better off to take his chance at law, as was observed by the gentleman from Massachusetts; for, in that case, he would have an opportunity of throwing the burden of the proof on his adversary; he would have the benefit of counsel, and a trial by jury, besides the interlocutory trials arising from a misnomer, &c. He therefore conceived this part of the bill not consonant with the title, for his idea of giving relief was, with the title, for his case should be better and not worse.

Mr. STRACAS said, he did not conceive the relief proposed to be administered ought to be considered in the light of mercy, but justice. The mode of relief pointed out in the bill, however the circumstances may appear, leaves the sufferer in a situation that no person ought to be liable to who is not guilty of a violation of the laws intentionally or wilfully, for he is, at any rate, to lose one-half of his property. The case stated by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. BURKE,) he thought, was very pertinent.

Mr. FITZSIMONS said, he hoped, if those words were struck out, that the whole clause would be erased, and that a more equitable mode would be pointed out. He adverted to the practice in England, where, after a trial, application for relief is made to the commissioners.

Mr. WADSWORTH said, it seemed to be supposed that the revenue laws were sufficiently plain to be understood; but he conceived this was not the case, because the collectors at the several ports had put different constructions upon them.

Mr. AMES observed, that he had no doubt that when the committee possessed themselves with a more competent knowledge of the operation and tendency of the bill, it would meet with approbation. With respect to the offender losing the half of his property on confession, he observed, that this inconvenience might be prevented by the person filing his petition previous to information being laid by the person seizing the property. And that, he said, he would always have it in his power to do.

Mr. STOWE said, there were two considerations with respect to this measure; the first was, whether such a discretionary power ought to be trusted any where or not; because it might do a greater injury to the revenue than benefit to the individual; and, second, whether, if such a trust was necessary, it had not better be made a judicial right than leave it to an arbitrary determination, independent of the principles of law? He hoped these two points would be considered before the bill was decided upon.

Mr. SCOTT objected to the bill, upon the grounds already mentioned by other gentlemen; but he had one further reason for disliking it: it was this—that after a man had been convicted by the verdict of a jury, of a breach of the law, he might avail himself of this act, because it admitted the petition to be presented at any time before judgment is rendered; so the offender might have his petition ready in his pocket, to present to the bench immediately after he had heard the decision of the jury.

The motion for striking out the words being put, was carried in the affirmative, and the committee rose, and reported the bill as amended; whereupon it was ordered to be re-committed to a Select Committee.

MONDAY, February 8.

The memorial of Robert Morris, desiring an investigation into his conduct as Superintendent of Finance, was presented and referred, with a request that it might be entered at length on the Journal. A copy of this memorial appears in the Appendix to this volume.

Mr. GOODHUE presented a petition from sundry inhabitants of Salem, stating, that through a very particular construction of a section in the coasting law, vessels owned by the citizens of the United States, and, as they thought, properly qualified as such, had been obliged to pay the alien duty in some of the Southern States, and praying a relief or a refund of the duty so paid. Laid on the table.

CENSUS BILL.

On motion of Mr. SEDGWICK, the Committee of the Whole House was discharged from any further discussion of the bill providing for the actual enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States.

It was then voted that the blanks in the bill should be filled up.

The first blank respected the time to be allowed for completing the enumeration; six, four, and three months were proposed.

Mr. SEDGWICK said, that as so long a time is to elapse before the assistants are to enter upon the business, the work of preparation would be completed in such a manner that he conceived three, two, or even one month would be sufficient.

Mr. WHITE said, that he was certain, that in many of the States, two, three, or four months would be found short enough to complete the enumeration in those States. In the Eastern States the business might be finished in a much shorter period; but when the time shall be elapsed that is allowed by law, and the enumeration is completed in some of the States, and the numbers fully returned, it cannot be supposed that those States who have not completed theirs should acquiesce in any regulations and establishments founded on so imperfect a statement.

Mr. BURKE was in favor of allowing the longest period, on account of the great variety of obstacles and impediments in the way of completing the enumeration within so short a time, even as six months; and the census, when returned in so incomplete a state, could not be supposed satisfactory; it would create uneasiness, and might terminate in absolute injustice.

Mr. JACKSON adverted to the peculiar circumstances of the Southern States, particularly Georgia, and the recent accession of the State of North Carolina to the Union, the extensiveness of the territory of those States, and the dispersed situation of their inhabitants, and contended that six months would be but a short time in which to complete the business.

Mr. MADISON observed, that the situation of the several States was so various, that the difficulty of adopting a plan for effecting the business, upon terms that would give general satisfaction, could only be obviated by allowing sufficient time. Some of the States have been accustomed to take the enumeration of their citizens, others have never done it at all. To the former, the business will be easy, and may be completed within the shortest period; in the others, it will be attended with unforeseen difficulties. In addition to these, there is another consideration to be taken into view. There must be a greater number of assistants employed in the Southern States; there are many contingencies that cannot be provided against; the assistants may die and leave the business unfinished; it may be necessary to appoint others. The returns from so many persons, from such extensive districts, will require such a length of time as leaves no probability that it can be completed in a shorter period than three months.

Mr. SEDGWICK said, he did not wish to precipitate the business. The equalizing the representation ought to be a matter of serious concern to every gentleman; it was peculiarly so to the delegation from those States who are so unequally represented; he wished for a full and competent enumeration, and was for allowing full time to complete it in. But there did not appear to him any force in the objection raised from the contingency of the death of the assistants; the longer the period was, there certainly was the greater probability of such events. And he was clearly of opinion, that extending the period would not conduce to obtaining, finally, so accurate an enumeration.

The question being taken on "six months," it was carried in the affirmative.

The other blanks in the bill were filled up, and it passed the House.

PUBLIC CREDIT.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury relative to a provision for the support of public credit was before them. Mr. BALDWIN in the Chair.

After a silence of some minutes, Mr. LIVERMORE asked what part of the report it was expected that gentlemen should speak to? He wished some gentlemen would select such parts as he conceived to be of importance, and submit them to the committee.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, was of opinion, that the committee had better consider the object of the report, in separate points of view, by which means they would be able to go through the investigation with a greater degree of accuracy than if they were left to range at large in the extensive field before them. The report contains objects so various, that it is possible gentlemen may agree, with respect to one or two, and yet differ on a third: from this consideration, he was induced to suggest the idea of single and independent resolutions, and had prepared the following: if the manner met the approbation of the committee, he would lay them on the table for consideration. They were to the following effect:

Resolved, That Congress ought not to adjourn, until they have adopted such measures as will make an adequate provision for the public debt.

Resolved, That in making such provision, no discrimination shall be made between the original holders of the evidences, and the assignees thereof.

Resolved, That such of the debts of the individual States, as have been incurred by them, during the late war, ought to be assumed by the General Government, and like funds provided for them.

Resolved, That the arrearages of interest on the Continental and State debts, ought to be funded, and consolidated with the principal.

Resolved, That the interest to be paid thereon does not exceed — per cent. per annum, for the present.

These motions were severally expressive of objects contemplated in the Secretary's report. The last was upon a principle of modification, such as was held out in the plan for relieving the debt.

If he was seconded, he would lay these resolutions on the table.

Mr. BOURNOR.—I take it, Mr. Chairman, we are now in a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of considering a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, founded on an order of this House, given at their last session; our business, therefore, is to contemplate the debt of the Union, and to devise the proper measures to be pursued in regard thereof. In the first instance, then, we are to consider the nature of the debt; and in the second, whether we will fund it in the manner proposed in the report on the table, or in what other way it shall be done. I apprehend, sir, we pledged ourselves to do this, when we resolved that an adequate provision for the support of public credit was a matter of high importance to the national honor and prosperity. We have since that given a solemn assurance, in our Address to the President, that this subject shall be among the first to engage our attention. Having, therefore, proceeded so far in this business, there can be little debate with respect to the first resolution proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina.

We are bound by every principle of honor, of interest, and of policy, to look this subject in the face; and in doing this, let us advert to the origin of our debt, and view the end it was intended to answer. Perhaps a small portion of our time may be well spent, in recalling to our recollection the peculiar situation of these United States at that period. But I find the portrait better drawn, in an address of the late Congress, of May, 1789, than I can express it: I will therefore give it to you in their own language.

Mr. B. here proceeded to read the address: in the first place it represents the then situation of our affairs. America, without arms, ammunition, discipline, revenue, government, or ally; almost totally stripped of commerce, and in the weakness of youth, as it were, with a "staff and a sling," only dared "in the name of the Lord of Hosts," to engage a gigantic adversary, prepared at all points, boasting of his strength, and of whom mighty warriors "were greatly afraid."

For defraying the expense of this uncommon war, your Representatives in Congress were obliged to emit paper money; an expedient that you know was heretofore generally and successfully practised on this Continent.

They were very sensible of the inconveniences with which too frequent emissions would be attended, and endeavored to avoid them. For this purpose, they established loan offices so early as in October, 1776; and have, from that time to this, repeatedly and earnestly solicited you to lend them money on the faith of the United States. The sums received on loan have, nevertheless, proved inadequate to the public exigencies. Our enemy, prosecuting the war, by sea and land, with implacable fury, and with some success; taxation at home, and from borrowing abroad, in the midst of difficulties and dangers, were alike impracticable; hence the continued necessity of new emissions.

The address goes on, and points out other causes of these emissions, which it was impracticable for Congress to redress at that time, but which they recommend now to be done. We are persuaded (say they) you will use all possible care to make the promotion of the general welfare interfere as little as may be with the ease and comfort of individuals; but, though the raising of these sums should press heavily on some of our constituents; yet the obligations we feel to your venerated clergy, the truly helpless widows and orphans, your most gallant, generous, meritorious officers and soldiers, the public faith, and the commonwealth, so irresistibly urges us to attempt the appreciation of your currency, that we cannot withhold obedience to those authoritative sensations.

On this subject we will only add, that as the rules of justice are most pleasing to our infinitely good and gracious Creator, and an adherence to them most likely to obtain his favor, so they will ever be found to be the best and safest maxims of human policy.

To our constituents, we submit the propriety and purity of our intentions, well knowing they will not forget that we lay no burdens upon them but those in which we participate with them; a happy sympathy that pervades societies formed on the basis of equal liberty. Many cares, many labors, and may we not add, reproaches, are peculiar to us: these are the emoluments of our unsolicited stations; and with these we are content, if you approve our conduct. If you do not, we shall return to our private condition, with no other regret than that which will arise from our not having served you as acceptably, and as essentially, as we wished and strove to do, though as cheerfully and faithfully as we could.

They then proceeded to detail the advantages arising from an alliance formed between the King of France and these United States; and observed that, when unprepared, undisciplined, and unsupported, we opposed the fleets and armies of our enemy in full conjoined force, then, if at any time, was conquest to be apprehended. Yet, what progress towards it did their violent and incessant efforts make? Judge from their own conduct. Having devoted you to bondage, and after vainly wasting their blood and treasure, in the dishonorable enterprise, they designed at length to offer terms of accommodation, with respectful addresses, to that once despised body, the Congress, whose humble supplications, only for peace, liberty, and safety, they had contemptuously rejected, under the pretence that it was an unconstitutional assembly. Nay, more desirous of reducing you into a deviation from the paths of rectitude, from which they had so far and so rashly wandered, they made most specious offers to tempt you into a violation of your faith, given to your illustrious ally. Their arts were as unavailing as their arms.

Foiled again, and stung with rage, imbibed by envy, they had no alternative but to renounce an inglorious and ruinous controversy, or to resume their former modes of prosecuting it. They chose the latter. Again the savages were stimulated to horrid massacres of men, women, and children, and domestics to the murder of their masters. Again our brave and unhappy brethren were doomed to miserable deaths in jails and prison ships. To complete the sanguinary system, all the "extremities of war" were, by authority, denounced against us.

Piously endeavor to derive this consolation from their remorseless fury, that "the Father of mercies" looks down with disapprobation on such audacious defiance of his holy laws; and be further comforted with recollecting that the arms assumed by you, in your righteous cause, have not been sullied by any unjustifiable severities.

Your enemies, despairing, however, as it seems, of the success of their united forces against our main army, have divided them, as if their design was to harass you by predatory, desultory operations. If you are assiduous in improving opportunities, Saratoga may not be the only spot on the Continent to give a new denomination to the bailed troops of a nation, impiously priding herself in notions of her omnipotence.

Rouse yourselves, therefore, that this campaign may finish the great work you have so nobly carried on for several years past. What nation ever engaged in such a contest, under such a complication of disadvantages, so soon surmounted many of them, and in so short a period of time had so certain a prospect of a speedy and happy conclusion? We will venture to pronounce that so remarkable an instance exists not in the annals of mankind.

We well remember what you said at the commencement of this war. You saw the immense difference between your circumstances and those of your enemies; and you knew that the quarrel involved no less than your lives, liberties, and estates. All these you liberally put to every hazard, resolving rather to die freemen than live slaves; and justice will oblige the impartial world to confess that you have uniformly acted on the same general principle. Consider how much you have done, and how, comparatively, little remains to be done to crown you with success. Persevere, and you insure peace, freedom, safety, glory, sovereignty, and felicity to yourselves, your children, and your children's children.

Encouraged by favors already received from Infinite Goodness, gratefully acknowledge them, earnestly imploring their continuance, constantly endeavoring to draw them down on your heads by an amendment of your lives, and a conformity to the Divine Will, humbly confiding in the protection so often and so wonderfully experienced; vigorously employ the means placed by Providence in your hands for completing your labors.

Fill up your battalions; be prepared in every part to repel the incursions of your enemies; place your several quotas in the Continental Treasury; lend your money for public uses; sink the emissions of your respective States; provide effectually for expediting the conveyance of supplies for your armies and fleets, and for your allies; prevent the produce of your country from being monopolized; effectually superintend the behaviour of public officers; diligently promote piety, brotherly love, learning, frugality, and moderation; and may you be approved, before Almighty God, worthy of those blessings we devoutly wish you to enjoy.

This being the situation of our country, Congress, in the September following, called on the citizens for loans, and for taxes, and pledged the United States for the ultimate redemption of the principal, and the intermediate punctual payment of the interest.

They then took up the subject of finance, under three different heads:

1st. Whether, and in what manner, the faith of the United States had been pledged for the redemption of their bills?

2d. Whether the United States had put themselves into a political capacity to redeem their bills? This is a question which calls for more full discussion.

Our enemies, as well foreign as domestic, have labored to raise doubts on this head. They argue, that the confederation of the States remains yet to be perfected; that the Union may be dissolved, Congress be abolished, and each State, resuming its delegated powers, proceed, in future, to hold and exercise all the rights of sovereignty appertaining to an independent State. In such an event, say they, the Continental bills of credit, created and supported by the Union, would die with it. This position being assumed, they next proceed to assert this event to be probable; and in proof of it, urge our divisions, our parties, our separate interests, distinct manners, former prejudices, and many other arguments, equally plausible, and equally fallacious. Examine this matter.

For every purpose essential to the defence of those States in the progress of the present war, and necessary to the attainment of the objects of it; these States now are as fully, legally, and absolutely confederated, as it is possible for them to be. Read the credentials of the different delegates who composed the Congress in 1774, 1775, and part of 1776, you will find that they establish an union for the express purpose of opposing oppressions of Britain, and obtaining redress of grievances. On the fourth of July, 1776, your representatives in Congress, perceiving that nothing less than unconditional submission would satisfy our enemies, did, in the name of the people of the thirteen United Colonies, declare them to be free and independent States, and, "for the support of that declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, did mutually pledge to each other their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor."

Was ever confederation more formal, more solemn, or more explicit? It has been expressly assented to, and ratified by every State in the Union. Accordingly, for the direct support of this declaration, that is, for the support of the independence of these States, armies have been raised, and bills of credit emitted, and loans made to pay and supply them. The redemption, therefore, of these bills, the payment of these debts, and the settlement of the accounts of the several States, for expenditures of services for the common benefit, and in this common cause, are among the objects of this confederation; and, consequently, while all or any of its objects remain unattained, it cannot, so far as it may respect such objects, be dissolved, consistently with the laws of God or man.

3d. Whether, admitting the ability and political capacity of the United States to redeem their bills, there is any reason to apprehend a wanton violation of the public faith?

It is with great regret and reluctance, that we can prevail upon ourselves to take the least notice of a question which involves in it a doubt so injurious to the honor and dignity of America.

The enemy, aware that the strength of America lay in the union of her citizens, and the wisdom and integrity of those to whom they committed the direction of their affairs, have taken unwearied pains to disunite and alarm the people, to depreciate the abilities and virtue of their rulers, and to impair the confidence reposed in them by their constituents. To this end, repeated attempts have been made to draw an absurd and fanciful line of distinction between the Congress and the people, and to create an opinion and a belief, that their interests and views were different and opposed. Hence, the ridiculous tales, the invidious insinuations, and the whimsical suspicions, that have been forged and propagated by disguised emissaries and traitors, in the garb of patriots. Hence has proceeded the notable discovery, that as Congress made the money they also can destroy it; and, that it will exist no longer than they find it convenient to permit it. It is not surprising, that in a free country, where the tongues and pens of such people are and must be licensed, such political heresies should be inculcated and diffused; but it is really astonishing, that the mind of a single virtuous citizen in America should be influenced by them. It certainly cannot be necessary to remind you, that your representatives here are chosen from among yourselves; that they are sent to speak your sentiments, and that it is constantly in your power to remove such as do not. You surely are convinced, that it is no more in their power to annihilate your money than your independence, and that any act of theirs for either of these purposes would be null and void.

We should pay an ill compliment to the understanding and honor of every true American were we to adduce many arguments to show the baseness or bad policy of violating our national faith, or omitting to pursue the measures necessary to preserve it. A bankrupt, faithless Republic would be a novelty in the political world, and appear among reputable nations, like a common prostitute among chaste and reputable matrons. The pride of America revolts from the idea; her citizens know for what purposes these emissions were made, have repeatedly pledged their faith for the redemption of them: they are to be found in every man's possession, and every man is interested in their being redeemed; they must therefore entertain a high opinion of American credit, who suppose the people are capable of believing, on due reflection, that all America will, against the faith, the honor, and the interest of this country, be ever prevailed upon, though the arts of our enemies will not be wanting to draw us into this humiliating and contemptible situation. Impelled by malice, and the suggestions of chagrin and disappointment, at not being able to bend our necks to their yoke, they will endeavor to force or seduce us to commit this unpardonable sin, in order to subject us to the punishment due to it; and that we may thenceforth be a reproach and by-word among the nations. Apprised of these consequences, knowing the value of national character, and impressed with a due sense of the immutable laws of justice and honor, it is impossible that America should think without horror of such an execrable deed.

If, then, neither our ability, nor our inclination to discharge the public debt are justly questioned, let our conduct correspond with this confidence, and let us rescue our credit from its present imputations.

They then go on, and point out the means by which this may be done. The war, though drawing fast to a successful issue, still rages. Disdain to leave the whole business of your defence to your ally. Be mindful that the brightest prospects may be clouded, and that prudence bids us to be prepared for every event. Provide, therefore, for continuing your armies in the field, till victory and peace shall lead them home; and avoid the reproach of permitting the currency to depreciate in your hands, when, by yielding a part to taxes and loans, the whole might have been appreciated and preserved. Humanity, as well as justice, makes this demand upon you; the complaints of ruined widows, and the cries of fatherless children, whose whole support has been placed in your hands, and melted away, have doubtless reached you. Rouse, therefore; strive who shall do most for his country; rekindle that flame of patriotism which, at the mention of disgrace and slavery, blazed throughout America, and animated all her citizens. Determine to finish the contest as you began it, honestly and gloriously. Let it not be said, that America had no sooner become independent than she became insolvent; or, that her infant glories and growing fame were obscured and tarnished by broken contracts and violated faith, in the very hour when all the nations of the earth were admiring, and almost adoring the splendor of her rising.

I conceive, Mr. Chairman, after duly considering the momentous circumstances I have brought to your attention, there is no man possessed of the principles of common honesty, within the sound of my voice, that will hesitate to conclude with me, that we are bound by every principle of honor, justice, and policy, to fund the debt of the United States, which has been one great means, under heaven, of securing to us our independence. I presume, sir, on this point we shall have no dispute. All that remains, then, for our consideration, is the manner and means of accomplishing it. We must view it as a debt of honor, from the nature of the contract, from the objects effected, and the happy state we are now in. The principles of interest call loudly upon us to complete the business so happily begun. The Secretary, in the report before us, observes, with great justice, that exigencies are to be expected to occur in the affairs of nations, in which there will be a necessity for borrowing, and particularly in a country like this, possessed of little moneyed capital. How much, then, is it our interest to secure our public credit on a stable and sure foundation? Besides this, it is our interest in another point of view; by this means we shall introduce a medium into circulation which will give a spring to the agriculture, commerce, and manufactures of the Union.

Our policy also guides us into the adoption of some such measure as is proposed in the report. A punctual performance of our public engagements will invite moneyed men, in the days of distress, to lend us every pecuniary aid. Our debt undoubtedly is large; but not so large as might have been reasonably expected, considering the magnitude of the object we have successfully accomplished; but it can by no means be considered so large as to prevent us from an attempt to discharge it.

Let us then adopt the motion now on your table, or something like it; not, perhaps, immediately, because it might be supposed to preclude that discussion which the subject requires, as the most important that has, or can come before us. Mr. FITZSIMONS had the same idea with the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. SMITH,) that the attention of the committee ought to be confined to specific objects. With this view he had endeavored to collate, and render perspicuous, the great outline of the Secretary's plan. They were more particular than those laid on the table, though they were substantially the same. He wished to be understood, that if the committee inclined to take them into consideration, he did not mean to bind himself to support them by the part he had taken in bringing them forward.

He then read them, as follows:

1. Resolved, That adequate provision ought to be made for fulfilling the engagements of the United States in respect to their foreign debt.

2. Resolved, That permanent funds ought to be appropriated for the payment of interest on, and the gradual discharge of, the domestic debt of the United States.

3. Resolved, That the arrears of interest, including interest issued in payments thereof, ought to be provided for on the same terms with the principal of the said debt.

4. Resolved, That the debts of the respective States ought, with the consent of the creditors, to be assumed and provided for by the United States.

5. Resolved, That it is advisable to endeavor to effect a new modification of the domestic debt, including that of the particular States, with the voluntary consent of the creditors, by a loan, upon terms mutually beneficial to them and to the United States.

6. Resolved, That for the purpose expressed in the last preceding resolution, subscriptions towards a loan ought to be opened to the amount of the said debt, including that of the respective States, upon the terms following, to wit:

That for every hundred dollars subscribed, payable in the said debt (as well interest as principle) the subscriber be entitled, at his option, either To have two-thirds funded, at an annuity or yearly interest of six per cent., redeemable at the pleasure of the Government, by payment of the principal; and to receive the other third in lands in the Western Territory, at the rate of twenty cents per acre: or

To have the whole sum funded at an annuity or yearly interest of four per cent., irredeemable by any payment exceeding five dollars per annum, on account both of principal and interest; and to receive as a compensation for the reduction of interest, fifteen dollars and eighty cents, payable in lands, as in the preceding case: or

To have sixty-six dollars and two-thirds of a dollar funded immediately, at an annuity or yearly interest of six per cent., irredeemable by any payment exceeding four dollars and two-thirds of a dollar per annum, on account both of principal and interest; and to have, at the end of ten years, twenty-six dollars and eighty-eight cents, funded at the like interest and rate of redemption; or

To have an annuity for the remainder of life, upon the contingency of living to a given age, not less distant than ten years, computing interest at four per cent.: or

To have an annuity for the remainder of life, upon the contingency of the survivorship of the younger of two persons, computing interest, in this case also, at four per cent.

7. Resolved, That immediate provision ought to be made for the present debt of the United States; and that the faith of Government ought to be pledged to make provision at the next session for so much of the debts of the respective States, as shall have been subscribed upon any of the terms expressed in the last resolution.

8. Resolved, That the funds which shall be appropriated according to the second of the foregoing resolutions be applied, in the first place, to the payment of interest on the sums subscribed towards the proposed loan; and that, if any part of the said domestic debt shall remain unsubscribed, the surplus of the said funds be applied by a temporary appropriation to the payment of interest on the unsubscribed part, so as not to exceed for the present four per cent. per annum; but this limitation shall not be understood to impair the right of the non-subscribing creditors to the residue of the interest on their respective debts; and in case the aforesaid surplus shall prove insufficient to pay the non-subscribing creditors, at the aforesaid rate of four per cent., that the faith of Government be pledged to make good such deficiency.

Mr. PAGE requested the report of the Secretary to be read, as it was the groundwork of the business they were in committee upon; and he requested gentlemen to offer their motions, when the part of the report to which they related was under consideration.

After reading the report, the committee rose and reported progress.

TUESDAY, February 9.
PUBLIC CREDIT.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. BALDWIN in the Chair.

Mr. SMITH withdrew his motion of yesterday, to make way for the resolutions of Mr. FITZSIMONS.

Mr. JACKSON objected to receiving the whole of those resolutions, lest it should be inferred that the committee bound themselves to adopt them.

Mr. FITZSIMONS said, he had declared his intentions to the committee yesterday when he brought them forward; he would repeat them again; he meant that the committee should have some systematic plan of proceeding before them, to consider and decide on each resolution singly; but he by no means intended the resolutions, if admitted, to be binding on any member; he did not mean to pledge even himself to support them all.

Mr. JACKSON was satisfied to go into a consideration of them on these terms.

Mr. STONE moved to amend it by striking out the words "in respect to their foreign debt;" and then modify the next resolution by striking out the word "domestic."

1st CON.—7

After some suspense, this motion not being seconded, the question was taken on the first resolution, which was carried in the affirmative unanimously.

Mr. JACKSON.—Believe me, Mr. Chairman, I have as high a sense of the obligation we are under to the public creditors, and feel as much gratitude towards them as any man on this floor. I shall ever cheerfully acknowledge the duty we owe to our benefactors, and in a peculiar manner to those brave soldiers who, at the risk of their lives and fortunes, secured the independence of America. I have also the most sincere wishes for the re-establishment of public credit, and that upon firm and solid ground, and on principles which cannot be called in question; but there appears to me a previous question, which has not yet been brought forward; it is this, whether there exists an immediate necessity for funding the national debt in the permanent manner proposed?

The high regard I have for the nature and circumstances of the foreign debt, induced me to let the first proposition pass without any animadversion. The vote which has been taken on that point will serve to show foreigners that we are concerned to preserve our credit with them by a rigid performance of our stipulations; trusting, at the same time, that our fellow-citizens cannot object to a distinction so just and proper in itself; for, notwithstanding what the domestic creditors may say, it is the money of foreigners that has, in a great measure, established our independence.

It is doubtful with me whether a permanent funded debt is beneficial or not to any country; some of the first writers in the world, and who are most admired on account of the clearness of their perceptions, have thought otherwise, and declared that wherever funding systems have been adopted in a Government, they tend more to injure posterity than they would injure the inhabitants to pay the whole debt at the time it was contracted. The principle, I apprehend, is demonstrated by experience; the first system of the kind that we have any account of originated in the State of Florence in the year 1634; that Government then owed about £60,000 sterling, and being unable to pay it, formed the principal into a funded debt, transferable with interest at five per cent. What is the situation of Florence in consequence of this event? Her ancient importance is annihilated. Look at Genoa and Venice; they adopted a similar policy, and are the only two of the Italian Republics who can pretend to an independent existence, but their splendor is obscured; they have never been able since the period at which a funding system was introduced to raise themselves to that formidable state to which they were before. Spain seems to have learned the practice from the Italian Republics, and she, by the anticipation of her immense revenue, has sunk her consequence beneath that level which her natural situation might have maintained. France is considerably enfeebled, and languishes under a heavy load of debt. England is a melancholy instance of the ruin attending such engagements.

[H. OF R.]

Public Credit.

[FEBRUARY, 1790.]

In the reign of King William, 1706, the policy of the English Parliament laid the foundation of what is called their national debt; but the sum was inconsiderable; it little exceeded £5,000,000 sterling; the example then set has been closely followed. In 1711, it amounted to £9,177,769 sterling; during the wars in the reign of Queen Anne; since that, the capital of the debt of Great Britain amounted, in 1777, to about £136,000,000 sterling; and to such a pitch has the spirit of funding and borrowing been carried in that country, that in 1786, their national debt had increased to £230,000,000 sterling; a burden which the most sanguine mind can never contemplate they will ever be relieved from. If future difficulties should involve that nation still further, what must be the consequence? The same effect must be produced that has taken place in other nations; it must either bring on a national bankruptcy, or annihilate her existence as an independent empire. Hence, I contend that a funding system in this country will be highly dangerous to the welfare of the Republic; it may, for a moment, raise our credit, and increase our circulation by multiplying a new species of currency; but it must hereafter settle upon our posterity a burden which they can neither bear nor relieve themselves from. It will establish a precedent in America that may, and in all probability will, be pursued by the Sovereign authority, until it brings upon us that ruin which it has never failed to bring; or is inevitably bringing upon all the nations of the earth who have had the temerity to make the experiment. Let us take warning by the errors of Europe, and guard against the introduction of a system followed by calamities so universal. Though our present debt be but a few millions, in the course of a single century it may be multiplied to an extent we dare not think of; for my part, I would rather have direct taxes imposed at once; which, in the course of a few years, would annihilate the principal of our debt. A few years' exertion in this way will save our posterity from a load of annual interest, amounting to the fifth, or perhaps the half of the sum we are now under engagements to pay.

But why, Mr. Chairman, should we hasten on this business of funding? Are our debts ascertained? The report of the Secretary of the Treasury proposes that we should not only fund the debts that are ascertained, but the unliquidated and unsettled debts due from the Continent; nor does the plan stop here; it proposes that we should assume the payment of the State debts—debts to us totally unknown. Many of the States, sir, have not yet ascertained what they owe; and if we do not know the amount of what we owe, or are to be indebted, shall we establish funds? Shall we put our hands into the pockets of our constituents, and appropriate moneys for uses we are undetermined of? But more especially shall we do this, when, in doing it, it is indisputably certain, that the incumbrance will more than exceed all the benefits and conveniences? Gentlemen may come forward, perhaps, and tell me, that funding the public debt will increase the circulating medium of the country, by means of its transferable quality; but this is denied by the best informed men. The funding of the debt will occasion enormous taxes for the payment of the interest. These taxes will bear heavily, both on agriculture and commerce. It will be charging the active and industrious citizen, who pays his share of the taxes, to pay the indolent and idle creditor who receives them, to be spent and wasted in the course of the year, without any hope of a future reproduction; for the new capital which they acquire must have existed in the country before, and must have been employed, as all capitals are, in maintaining productive labor. Thus the honest and hard-working part of the community will promote the ease and luxury of men of wealth; such a system may benefit large cities, like Philadelphia and New York, but the remote parts of the continent will not feel the invigorating warmth of the American treasury; in the proportion that it benefits the one, it will depress another.

But let me return to the question; does it not require, Mr. Chairman, I say again, that we should ascertain the debt we owe, before we proceed any further in the business? If gentlemen deny this, let me bring forward the old argument: North Carolina has acceded to the Union; she is a State of no inconsiderable importance; she has an equal right to a voice on this important business with any State in the Union; but she is not represented here, while we are funding the debts, not of ten or eleven States only, but a debt in which she must participate according to her proportion of representation; she may urge that we have no right to assume or transfer her particular debt from her own on to other shoulders; at least, after the declaration she has made, there is a delicacy in doing it without her presence. Things like these, pressed, without allowing time for deliberation, may justly give umbrage to all who are concerned for the independent privileges and sovereignty of the societies confederated under this Government; it may rouse the spirit of discord, and sound the alarm, at a time when unanimity or mutual forbearance is so requisite. Will all the States be satisfied that Congress should assume their debts under a pretext of easing them, when it must be well known that the General Government will thus have it in its power to call upon them to discharge the obligation, in an evil day, when they are unprepared? We know nothing of the future circumstances which may take place, or how far this Government may attempt to depress or injure individual States; we ought to guard, with the greatest degree of caution, against every danger of this nature.

Under these impressions, sir, I am led to conclude, that it is becoming the wisdom of Congress to postpone the consideration of the remaining propositions. Let us endeavor to discover whether there is an absolute necessity for adopting a funding system or not. If there is no such necessity, a short time will make it apparent; and let it be remembered what funds the United States possess in the Western Territory. The disposal of those lands may perhaps supersede the necessity of establishing a permanent system of taxation. The Secretary of the Treasury is directed to report on this head to the House, and perhaps that report may show us that this property is likely to be more productive than we at present apprehend; these considerations induce me to wish that the further consideration be postponed for the present.

Mr. SHERMAN.—The motion before the committee relates to the second resolution. The objects brought into view by the gentleman last up, are many of them unconnected with it, though they are severally objects of great importance. I think whatever doubts there may be with respect to the advantage or disadvantage of a public debt, we can none of us hesitate to decide that provision of some kind ought to be made for what we have already incurred. It is true, if we were about now to borrow money, it would be highly prudent to consider whether the anticipation would not be repaid by a speedy collection of taxes or duties to the amount; but when a debt is incurred beyond our present ability to discharge, we ought to make some provision for its gradual extinction, and, in the interim, pay punctually the interest; now, this resolution goes no further.

Some of the propositions which follow go further than this. They propose perpetual annuities, and talk of irredeemable stock. This is more than I am willing to agree to. I think it prudent for us to get out of debt as soon as we can; but then I do not suppose we can raise money enough to pay off the whole principal and interest in two, three, or ten years. If I am right in this, we ought to agree to some mode of paying the interest in the interim.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina.—The report of the Secretary of the Treasury contains a proposition for the establishment of a sinking fund. I wish the gentleman who brought forward the resolutions under consideration, had included that part of the system in his propositions, as it might have had a tendency to ease the mind of the honorable gentleman from Georgia, and to have shown him that the public debt is not intended to acquire the permanency which he dreads. If our present debt cannot be paid off at once, all that can be done is to provide such funds for its gradual extinction as will morally ensure the object.

The gentleman has contended that public funding is a public injury. I agree with him that funding a debt to a very great amount may be very injurious; yet funding a small debt is beneficial. But whether this is, or is not a fact, is not the object of our present inquiry; we are not in a situation to determine whether we will or will not have a public debt. We have it already, and it appears to me to be a matter of necessity that we should appropriate some funds for the payment of the interest upon it. When we consider the nature of the contract, for what it is we owe the money, and our ability to comply, it follows, of consequence, that we must pay; it follows as close as the shadow follows its substance; or as close as the night follows the day. The only question that can come before us is, the mode of doing it.

With respect to that part of our debt which is yet unascertained, I would just beg leave to observe, that it is not our fault that it remains in an unsettled state; neither is it the fault of those who have brought in their accounts and had them liquidated. Hence, it appears to me extremely hard that we should refuse to provide for the payment of those to whom we acknowledge ourselves to be indebted, because there are others whose claims against us are not yet adjusted. The argument, therefore, which relates to this point, as well as that which relates to the Western Territory, will apply ten years hence as well as now, and form an eternal pretext for deferring the business.

Mr. JACKSON begged the committee would not understand him, that he was against paying the debts of the United States; he had no such object in view. The sinking fund alluded to by the gentleman from South Carolina, had not escaped his attention; but he very much doubted whether it ought to be relied on to effect the purpose he had in view. He believed sinking funds were generally considered as a kind of stand-by, or subsidiary fund, always at hand to be mortgaged when money was proposed to be raised on any exigency of the State. He conceived the committee were precipitating the business, for the reason he before assigned. He would therefore endeavor to obtain their sense on this point, by moving that the committee rise.

This motion being seconded, it was put, and lost by a considerable majority.

Mr. STONE supposed, that this resolution did not bring forward the question, whether we were to have a permanent funding system or not; if only proposed something for the payment of the interest, and discharging the principal as fast as we could; but he would be glad to know what was the sense of the committee on this point.

Mr. BLAND inquired why there was a difference in the wording of the two first resolutions? It appeared to him to lead to that important question, whether the debts of the United States should be funded, on the principles of the report or not? If the gentleman who brought forward the resolutions would explain his intention, he should be able to judge whether it would be proper to amend the resolution or not. It appeared to him to imply that a discrimination was intended, to prevent which it would be proper to change it, so as to read:

Resolved, That adequate provision ought to be made for fulfilling the engagements of the United States in respect to their domestic debt.

Why a discrimination should be made between foreigners and our own citizens, I am at a loss to account; perhaps the necessities of the United States may be urged as a reason; but have we inquired into our capacity to fulfil our engagements, generally or specially? It appears to me that we have voted unanimously to do justice to our foreign creditors, before we make any inquiry into our ability. By this, perhaps, we have deprived the domestic creditor of a full participation in what we are able to perform; if so, it may be a reason why we discriminate between them.

Mr. FITZSIMONS said, that the circumstances of the foreign debt were such as left no choice in our power, according to the plan proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury; but we have it in our power, and are recommended to make a different arrangement with respect to the domestic debt. I stated, when I introduced the resolutions, that they were intended to bring the Secretary's plan fairly before the committee. This resolution is differently worded on that account; but it may be observed, that the foreign creditors are not here to make a contract with the people of the United States, but the domestic creditors are; and we may hold out a modification to them for their acceptance. With respect to the means by which we shall be enabled to pay the interest and principal of our debt, this resolution has nothing to do, it leaves it to the consideration of the committee; and every gentleman will be perfectly at liberty to propose and support such as he supposes to be most suitable to our abilities.

Mr. BLAND then proposed to substitute a resolution respecting the domestic debt, similar to that adopted respecting the foreign debt, if it was in order. He thought it would decide the question, whether there should be a discrimination between the foreign and domestic creditor, and would leave the committee equally free with respect to the means that the one now before the House did.

Mr. LIVERMORE.—I do not clearly understand the import of the resolution before the committee. It seems worded rather in a doubtful manner. If it mean that funds ought to be appropriated for the payment of the interest and principal of the domestic debt, as the amount appears on the face of the certificates, I shall be totally against it; whether it pointedly carries that meaning or not, I cannot say.

For my part, I consider the foreign and domestic debt to carry with them very material distinctions. The one is not like a debt, while the other has all the true qualities of one. However gentlemen may think on this subject, there is a great difference between the merits of that debt which was lent the United States in real coin, by disinterested persons, not concerned or benefited by the Revolution, and at a low rate of interest, and those debts which have been accumulating upon the United States, at the rate of six per cent. interest, and which were not incurred for efficient money lent, but for depreciated paper, or services done at exorbitant rates, or for goods or provisions supplied at more than their real worth, by those who received all the benefits arising from our change of condition. It is within the knowledge of every gentleman, that a very considerable part of our domestic loan-office debt arose in this manner. It is well known that loan-office certificates were issued as a kind of circulating medium, when the United States were in such straits for cash that they could not raise the necessary supplies in any other way. And it is very well known, that those who sold goods or provisions for this circulating medium, raised their prices from six to ten shillings at least.

There is another observation I would beg leave to make. The prices at which our supplies were procured were such, even in hard money, that it might be said specie had depreciated, or, what amounted to the same thing, the commodities were sold for more than their current price; in many cases, half the price would now purchase the same thing. If so, there is as much reason that we should now consider these public securities in a depreciated state, as every holder of them has considered them from that time to this. There was a period at which they were considered of no greater value than three or four shillings in the pound; at this day they are not at more than eight or ten. If this, then, is the case, why should Congress put it upon the same footing as the foreign debt, for which they received a hard dollar for every dollar they engaged to pay? Could any possible wrong be done to those who hold the domestic debt by estimating it at its current value? I do not speak of those only who have speculated in certificates. With respect to them, I do not see how a difference can be made. By the resolutions of Congress, and from the face of the papers, it appears that they were transferable.

It may be said, that there was some part of the domestic debt incurred by loans of hard money. There might be a small part lent in this way, but it was very small indeed, compared with the whole of the domestic debt. It is in the memory of every gentleman, that, before the beginning of the Revolution, every State issued paper money; it answered the exigencies of Government in a considerable degree. The United States issued a currency of the same nature, which answered their purposes, except in some particular cases, and these were effected by loans of certain sums of hard money. If any distinctions are to be made among the domestic creditors, it ought to be made in favor of such only, and that in consequence of the origin of the debt; while the great mass given for the depreciated paper, or provisions sold at double prices, ought to be liquidated at its real value. I cannot think it injustice to reduce the interest on those debts. I should therefore be against passing this resolution, if it carries in it the idea of paying the principal and interest, according to the face of the paper. It is well known, that a large proportion of this domestic debt was incurred for paper money lent. To be sure Congress acknowledged its value equal to its name; but this was done on a principle of policy, in order to prevent the rapid depreciation which was taking place. But money lent in this depreciated and depreciating state, can hardly be said to be lent from a spirit of patriotism; it was a mere speculation in public securities. They hoped, by putting their money in the loan-office, though in a depreciated state, to receive hard money for it by and by. I flatter myself this prediction will never be effected.

The Secretary of the Treasury has offered some alternatives to the creditors, out of which they may make their election; but it seems to me that they, all of them, propose a reduction in the principal and interest, that they may have an annuity of two-thirds, at six per centum, or for the whole sum at four per centum, or they may accept of the other terms. Though this may make a reduction favorable to the public, yet this is not such a reduction as justice, in my opinion, requires; and as the resolution before the committee is intended to make way for the adoption of those principles, I shall vote against it, though I would rather it was passed over for the present, in order to see what is the sense of the House on making a specific provision for the payment of the debt.

Mr. BLAND.—If we go into a discussion of the merits of the public creditors, I am clearly of opinion we shall never know where to stop. It would be impossible to fix a satisfactory point for the discrimination to stand at. My motive for rising is to settle the principle, and I am not afraid of facing it. I am one of those who will go as far as any man in fulfilling, to the utmost of our power, every public contract, and paying to the utmost farthing the bona fide debts of the United States.

When we speak of the difference between the foreign and domestic debt, are we aware of what we talk? Have the securities changed hands by the transfers which have taken place? The foreign debt is now become, in part, the property of the citizens of the United States, and a great part of the domestic debt is alienated to foreigners. Where, then, is the discrimination? Are not the moneys for the payment of the principal or interest of both, to come out of the same Treasury and resources? If these are facts, why shall we hesitate to declare that we will make equal provision for all? This is my object; it is not to inquire whether we have made with the one favorable, with the other unfavorable contracts, because what is done cannot be remedied. If I am seconded in bringing forward the object which my motion had in view, I shall be glad to attend to the discussion; but if not, I shall sit down contented.

Mr. PAGE was glad that the question had been asked the mover of the propositions on the table what was the object of the resolution now under consideration, because it was liable to be misunderstood. But now, he presumed, the answer had satisfied every gentleman's mind.

The gentleman from New Hampshire was pleased to observe, that foreigners were not interested in the late revolution; that what they did was from such motives as demanded our gratitude; but our citizens were deeply interested, and, I believe, if they were never to get a farthing for what is owing to them for their services, they would be well paid; they have gained what they aimed at; they have secured their liberties and their lives; they will be satisfied that this House has pledged itself to pay to foreigners the generous loans they advanced us in the day of distress.

If we were to make distinctions adverse to their interests, we could never expect from them a further favor in the future exigencies of this country. But we may also look with confidence at home for loans and services; on such occasions they will be supplied us on the principles of patriotism; the adoption of the first resolution was therefore politic and just, but the motion of my worthy colleague is not necessary. I feel for my fellow citizens who have gloriously exerted themselves in the salvation of their country by their services in the field, or the supplies which they yielded, as much as any man can do. I acknowledge the debt of gratitude the community owes to those select citizens, and am willing to pay it as far as we possibly can; but they cannot, they will not complain of the deference we have shown to others, whose particular situation merited such regard at our hands.

Mr. SCOTT.—I find myself obliged to consider the Government of the United States in a very different situation, with respect to our foreign and domestic creditors. With respect to the foreign debt, we, the representatives of the United States, are vested with full power, and we are bound in duty to provide for the punctual payment according to the nature of the contract; but when I turn my eyes to the domestic debt, I find myself in a very different situation. I conceive myself a mere arbitrator among the individuals of which the Union is composed. A part of the people have a claim upon somebody. I think that claim is against the people at large, and we are not only to provide for the payment of that claim, if just, but to determine whether that claim is just or not. One part of the community applies to us to recover of the other what is due to it; the other says, the debt is too large, it is more than is justly due; you must try and determine between us, and say what part is just, and what is not. This brings clearly into my view the whole subject, as a thing within the power of Congress to new model or modify, if we find that justice demands it; but we have no such authority with respect to the foreign debt. It is very clear to me, that we have the power to administer justice and impartiality among the members of the Union; and this will lead me freely to assert, that we have not only authority, but it is our duty, if, on examination, we find that not more than half the sum that is claimed is justly claimed, to strike off the other half. If we find, on full investigation, that the payment of it, in such sort as to do complete justice. Which of these may be found to be the case in reality, when well examined, I will not pretend to say; but, at any rate, we are in the dark at present, inasmuch as we do not know the real amount. We cannot say whether it is possible for us to pay it; we cannot know whether it is just or not until we know what the claim is, as to quantity and quality. I do believe we are now walking on the brink of a precipice, that it will be dangerous for us to step too hastily upon.

I wish the subject to be duly considered; I wish every man in this House was of the same opinion with me in one respect, that we are judges to determine matters of right and equity. We are, in fact, as a court of law: can we propose to decide with wisdom, whether the claims are just or not, until the claims are exhibited? I presume we cannot. I am clear for going into the consideration of a resolve of the kind now before us, when these doubts are removed from my mind. Rationally, I cannot consider in what manner the debt can be paid, until these points are settled. Perhaps the resolutions might be worded in such a way as to give all the credit to the public securities, which they could derive from a more precise funding system, while, at the same time, sufficient room should be left for settling the great points which I have in contemplation.

[H. or R.]

Public Credit.

I have no idea, Mr. Chairman, that these securities can be raised to their nominal value by the most explicit vote of this House. I do not believe they can acquire that stability which some gentlemen imagine. I am led to view the subject in this light from experience. I have seen, within a few days, a warrant from the Treasury for one hundred dollars, payable in the month of March, which was sold for eighty dollars cash. Here was a loss of one-fifth upon a note of which neither the seller nor buyer could suppose punctual payment would be refused. Now, if this is the case with public debts of a certain nature, we cannot reasonably expect that funding our debts will raise the public securities to any thing near their nominal value. Indeed, I believe it would have very little effect upon them. Men in business would give little more for a certificate drawing four dollars per cent. per annum, than they would now. Supposing, then, the public credit will be unaffected in a great degree by the present measure, I would propose to take time for the purpose of ascertaining the justice of these claims. I will, therefore, move to amend the resolution now before us, by adding these words: "as soon as the same is ascertained and duly liquidated."

Mr. BOURNOR.—I am glad to see gentlemen bring into view principles on which to determine the great question before us; because, when they are once established, they will enable us to proceed with certainty to a decision. If the principles brought forward by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania are just, his arguments are of great weight; but if, on consideration, we shall find that the principles are unjust, then I presume, however cogent the system of reasoning he has founded thereon, it will not prevail.

He supposes we sit here as judges to determine the different claims of the creditors of the United States. If we are in that predicament, I agree we ought not to proceed on full evidence and hearing of those claims. But I have never hitherto been led to consider Congress in this light, nor can I now consider them in any such point of view. I consider the Congress, who entered into these engagements, as complete representatives of the United States, and, in their political capacity, authorized, by the articles of Confederation, to contract the debts for which our public faith is pledged. Instead of being judges, or arbitrators, on this occasion, we are parties to the contract; nor is our case varied by the dissolution of the old Confederacy, because the existing Constitution has expressly recognised the engagements made under the former. All debts contracted before the adoption of this Constitution shall be as valid against the United States, under this Government, as under the Confederation. Now is the moment to establish the principle; if the Constitution admits the borrowing of money, or paying for supplies, to be a contract, we are one of the parties to this contract, and all idea of being arbiters must vanish. We cannot judge in our own cause.

The case will now stand clear: we owe a debt contracted for a valuable consideration. The evidences of our debt are in the hands of our creditors, and we are called upon to discharge them; if we have it in our power, we ought to consider ourselves bound to do it, on every principle of honor, of justice, and of policy. But as we have not the ability to pay the whole off, nor, perhaps, the whole interest, we must endeavor to make such a modification as will enable us to satisfy every one. Not that this modification shall take place without the consent of the creditors; this would be improper and unjust. Each party is as much to be consulted on this occasion, as it was at the time of the first contract. If, then, Congress is bound by the first contract, no gentleman can say we are judges. If we are parties, what would be the decision before a court of justice? The creditor produces my bond, by which I have bound myself to pay a hundred dollars; I cannot gainsay the fact; no man is allowed to plead that he has made a bad bargain, and that, at other times, he could have purchased what he got of the creditor at half the sum he was forced to allow him. The inquiry with the judges is not whether the debtor made a good bargain or not, but whether he did it fairly and voluntarily. We are in the same predicament if we fairly and honestly received the quid pro quo; we are bound, as parties to the honest performance of the contract, to discharge the debt; otherwise, what avails the clause in the Constitution, declaring all debts contracted, and engagements entered into, before its adoption, to be as valid against the present Government as they were under the old Confederation? The debt was bona fide contracted; it was acknowledged by the United States; and the creditor received a certificate as the evidence of his debt. It is immaterial to us what he did with it. I confess, if the original holder was to come forward, and say that he had been robbed of such evidence, we ought not to pay it until the point was ascertained in a court of justice.

I can by no means consider the Congress of the United States judges on this occasion. We are not called upon as arbiters; our creditors justly consider us as parties, and call upon us for the payment of what we acknowledge to be due. They require at our hands the discharge of the engagement, of which they present the written evidence

Public Credit.

I confess we are not warranted to charge our constituents with unreasonable burdens; and therefore, I presume we are authorized to make propositions to our creditors for a more convenient mode of payment than what was originally contracted for; but this is optional with them. If they refuse to listen to us, and insist upon their just claim, we must satisfy it as far as we have the ability; thus far, I presume, we may fairly go, in regard to the domestic debt.

Some observations were made to point out a difference between the foreign and domestic debt. I admit there is a distinction, and that in another instance, which has not been mentioned. His Most Christian Majesty, when he first became our important ally, presented Congress with a large sum of money; but this being insufficient to procure us the necessary supply of military stores, a loan was made us from the royal coffers of France. But this also being inadequate, we endeavored to obtain further aid from foreigners. The credit of the United States was so much impaired, as to hold out but little encouragement to individuals to trust us with their money. The French King added another mark of his distinguished attention: he guaranteed the loan, and the money was obtained—obtained of the widow and fatherless; of persons whose all depended upon a punctual payment of the interest. On this point, I could refer you to letters from our commissioners in Europe, who beg that we may not put them on this business, unless we are certain that the United States will carefully provide for the payment of the interest; because, in case of failure, hundreds must perish for want. This is another motive why we should attend to the performance of our contracts; and I will repeat again, it is what we are called upon to do upon every principle of honor, justice, and policy.

Mr. LAWRENCE.—The observations of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SCOTT,) if I rightly understand them, apply to the principal, and not the interest of the domestic debt. He imagines it to be too large; that is, that the individual who performed services, or rendered supplies during the late war, received evidences of rather too great nominal value; and that, at this period of time, it is necessary to investigate every particular claim, and judge whether the balances are respectively due or not. The gentleman has distinguished between the foreign and domestic creditor on this point; he supposes the foreign debt ought not to be re-examined, because the holders of it are unconnected with our Government. They lent us money, and we are bound according to the precise terms of the contract. Here I agree with him; but that there should be a solid distinction in justice between the foreign and domestic creditor is to me a singular thing. It was observed, that the citizens of America would be well paid for their loans, supplies, and services, by the benefits and profits arising to them by the Revolution; but are we to sacrifice the claims of individuals of the community for the advantage of the whole? Who are benefited by the Revolution? Every citizen.

Public Credit.

Then every citizen is bound to contribute his equal part of the expenses attending the procurement. Should those of our citizens who furnished the supplies, or loaned their money, be the only class who are injured? Every citizen is bound to pay according to his ability, because every one has participated in the benefit: then the only question to ask is, whether this discrimination should be made to ascertain or new proportion the debt? This will lead me to inquire whether it is proper for us, after the resolution we passed at the last session, after the resolution we have just now passed, to scale the public debt anew? Shall we say that the evidence carries on its face fraud and deception? I contend we shall not. Why shall we liquidate a debt which is established upon a complete and final settlement? From the face of the evidences arises the demand, and that is the demand we are to make provision for. Shall we go to our officers and soldiers who served during the late war, individually, and say that the balance struck to be due to them is an imposition on the public, when the Government itself has determined that they were entitled to such particular reward? If, at the time those securities were given to them, Government had paid them in money, would any gentleman now contend that their accounts ought to be liquidated, and every individual called upon to refund a part of what he acquired in conformity to the laws of his country? Certainly no gentleman would contend for such a measure. How is the nature of the case altered from the circumstances of our having been so unfortunate as to pay those worthy men with a certificate in lieu of the money which was due? The nature of the case, I conceive, is perfectly the same; and we are in duty bound to make a full compensation. The face of the paper expresses what that is, and it is to be our guide; the demand surely is not to be lessened.

Do gentlemen suppose that the United States were supplied at a higher rate than individuals? The contrary, I believe, is the fact, and it seems to arise from the nature of the thing. It was in the power of the public to give such prices as they thought proper, because they had power to take the property by force; whereas, the individual, who was supplied by his neighbor, charged him at such rate as was satisfactory. If the Government had generally given such price, there would have been no necessity of having recourse to the national strength for the purpose of obtaining the provisions and services necessary for the army. From this consideration, I am led to believe, that the supplies were furnished to the public cheaper than the market value.

Upon what principle is it that we have to go into this investigation? Will it lessen the demand so far as to indemnify us for the expense? I apprehend not. It will introduce a principle of uncertainty—an evidence, that to-day is worth a hundred dollars, to-morrow may not be worth that half of it; and will, consequently, give rise to that spirit of speculation which has been so earnestly deprecated on this floor.

The honorable mover of the amendment contends that we ought not to enter upon a permanent provision for the discharge of the domestic debt until we have ascertained its amount. Does he mean the sum total, with accuracy? If so, our proceedings will be delayed beyond the term of our existence. I contend, sir, that we know, as far as we can know, at this moment, what the amount of our debt is, except about two millions of dollars, principally arising from the remnant of the old Continental money, which has not yet been brought into the Treasury of the United States. But this is a subject which may be submitted to the discretion of the committee, and decided upon, as well from our present information as any we are likely to get in future.

It has been asked, whether it is likely to be beneficial or proper to appropriate permanent funds, in the manner proposed by the second resolution? My mind, Mr. Chairman, inclines to approve of permanent funds for that purpose; because, I believe, more public benefit will result from such a measure than any other; it will destroy that fluctuation which renders a public debt injurious, and will give it that stability necessary to introduce it as a circulating medium, by which numerous advantages will arise to the agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing interests. I therefore shall be inclined to favor the original motion, and reject the amendment; because our debt is already ascertained, and duly liquidated, except the two millions of dollars which it is in our power, as well, I say, to decide upon now, as at any future period.

Mr. JACKSON said there were, most surely, principles on which to ground a discrimination between a foreign and domestic creditor; if there was no other, there was this, that the domestic creditors are those that are bound to pay the foreign creditors their demand; they ought consequently to do justice to others, by a punctual payment, before they require a discharge of their own claims.

Mr. AMES did not conceive it material to inquire, whether there be an equal obligation on the people of the United States to pay their foreign and domestic creditors, when they meant to pay both; but if it is intended to reduce the principal of either, it will lead us into a discussion of the principles on which such a measure ought to be founded. The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SCOTT,) probably intends, by the amendment, to have a reduction of the debt; I have, said he, so much respect for the good sense and upright intentions of that honorable gentleman, that I will not impute to him unworthy motives; nor do I believe that he governs his conduct in private life by maxims which I suspect to be contained in the amendment now before us. I would not be understood, by any means, to convey an improper reflection upon the opinions of any one. The science of finance is new in America; a gentleman may therefore propose the worst of measures with the best intentions. What, let me inquire, will be the pernicious consequences resulting from the establishment of this doctrine?

Will it not be subversive of every principle on which public contracts are founded? The evidences of the debt, possessed by the creditors of the United States, cannot, in reason, justice, or policy, be considered in any other light than as public bonds, for the redemption and payment of which the property and labor of the whole people are pledged. The only just idea is, that when the public contract a debt with an individual, that it becomes personified, and that with respect to this contract, the powers of Government shall never legislate. If this was not the case, it would destroy the effect it was intended to produce; no individual would be found willing to trust the Government, if he supposed the Government had the inclination and power, by virtue of a mere major vote, to set aside the terms of the engagement. If the public in such a case is, as I have said, personified, what conceivable difference is there, except in favor of the creditor, between the public and an individual in the case? If, then, the public contract is a solemn obligation upon us, we are bound to its true and faithful performance. What is the object for which men enter into society, but to secure their lives and property? What is the usual means of acquiring property between man and man? The best right to property is acquired by the consent of the last owner. If, then, an individual is possessed of property, in consequence of this right, how can Government, founded on this social compact, pretend to exercise the right of divesting a man of that object, which induced him to combine himself with the society? Every gentleman may determine this question by his own feelings. Shall it be said that this Government, evidently established for the purpose of securing property, that, in its first act, it divested its citizens of seventy millions of money, which is justly due to the individuals who have contracted with Government? I believe those gentlemen, who are apprehensive for the liberties and safety of their fellow-citizens, under the efficacy of the present Constitution, will find real cause of alarm from the establishment of the present doctrine. I have heard, that in the East Indies, the stock of the labor and property of the Empire is the property of the Prince; that it is held at his will and pleasure; but this is a slavish doctrine, which I hope we are not prepared to adopt here. But I will not go further into a consideration of the idea of discrimination. I will ask, though, is this country ever to be in a settled and quiet state? Must every transaction that took place, during the course of the last war, be ripped up? Shall we never have done with the settlement and liquidation of our accounts? If this is the case, what kind of rights will the people have in their property? None but the will of the Government. And will this tend to the establishment of public credit? What security will they derive from a new promise? None. They will know that this can be set aside equally with the other, provided it is deemed expedient. What mischief will follow this idea? The public faith destroyed, our future credit will be a mere vapor; and all this risk is to be run for the sake of—what? Of saving something to the public? No; the public will lose by the transaction more than they will gain; our justice will be impeached, and foreigners will feel themselves happy, that they have it in their power, by violence, to procure to themselves that which we deny to our own citizens. Such a mere arbitrary act of power can never be exercised on the part of Government, but to the destruction of the essential rights of the people, and will finally terminate in a dissolution of the social compact.

Mr. LIVERMORE.—The arguments advanced by the gentlemen from Massachusetts and New York prove too much, and therefore prove nothing. That the late Congress had, at all times, from their first institution, the power to contract debts, for the benefit of the United States, cannot be denied; and that we are authorized to pay such debts, is equally certain. But this by no means contravenes the opinion of those gentlemen who think that the whole may be properly considered and discharged at the rate which justice requires; for the same argument which is urged for the payment of the public securities at their nominal value, might be urged in favor of paying off the Continental debts of credit, according to the sums expressed on the face of them. They were issued with as much confidence, and were received with as firm a reliance on the public faith, as any species of securities whatever; yet, it seems to be given up on all hands, that the owners of the old Continental paper bills ought not to be paid according to their nominal value. Perhaps it may be said, on comparing them with the loan-office certificates, that the United States had not the benefit of that money; but had they not the value of it? It will be answered, that when the money was first issued, Congress had nearly the value for it; but afterwards the money greatly depreciated, and they had not the full value for it, yet the obligation to pay it is as explicit as words can make it. No advocate will be found for making all that money good. It has been thought proper, and it is just, that it should be reduced from its nominal value; if it is reduced on a scale of one hundred for one, the holders of it, I dare say, would cheerfully receive that sum. If the United States then had value for it, and they had not value for the certificates, who can doubt of the justice of reliquidating, and duly ascertaining the public debt? All I contend for is this, that the present Government pay the debts of the United States; but as the domestic part of the debt has been contracted in depreciated notes, that less interest should be paid upon it than six per cent. Six per cent. was the usual interest upon the certificates when they were issued by Congress; but if the possessor has received no part of his six per cent. until this time, that now the principal and interest be consolidated into one sum, hereafter to bear an interest of three or four per cent.; then those citizens, who now stand as creditors of the Union, will find that part of their property has been the most productive of any, much more productive than the property of the citizens of the United States has generally been. Those who lent their money to individuals before and during the late war, generally lost or suffered by the depreciation of the capital; nay, some thirty-nine fortieths. But is this the case of the domestic creditor of the United States? No! he will preserve his property, through the chaos of the Revolution, and be put now in a more eligible situation than he was at the time he loaned his money. The capital sum which he lent is now increased, and very rapidly increased, for six per cent. is a very large interest. He will now receive 160 dollars for his 100, and putting that into the funds, at three or four per cent., he will find it more productive than any other method in which he could employ his money; for, I contend, that neither improved, nor unimproved lands, will give an interest near half of what the public creditor will receive. People who have held real property have sunk, with the taxes, and other losses, the greatest part of it, but the public creditor has let his run through the confusion of the Revolution, and nevertheless gets it returned to him safe; and, so far from being impaired, that it has prodigiously accumulated, not only in a manner superior to the property of his fellow-citizens, but superior to the foreigner who lent his money at four per cent. Justice and equity require, on the behalf of the community, that these people be content with reasonable profit. They ought not, therefore, to receive, on a funded debt, so much as six per cent.; whether three or four, or something between three and four, would be a proper sum, I shall not pretend to determine. But I consider it a proper question for this committee to consider, in justice to those who are to pay, as well as to those who are to receive; nor do I believe the domestic creditors would be dissatisfied with it, provided they were sure of receiving this annual interest; for their debts, on such a footing, would be better to them than if they were established on an extravagant plan, that could never be effected, but which would be likely to throw the nation into confusion. Every body has suffered more or less by the depreciation, but the public creditors very little, in regard to that part of their property which they had deposited in the hands of Government: it is true, that it has slept; but it is now waked up to some purpose.

Mr. SHERMAN.—I do not differ much in principle from the gentleman who spoke last, from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SCOTT,) but I do not extend my views so far as he extends his, in the exercise of the power which he contends is vested in this body. I look upon it, that legislators act in a threefold capacity; they have the power to make laws for the good government of the people, and a right to repeal, and alter those laws as public good requires; in another capacity, they have a right to make contracts; but here I must contend that they have no right to violate, alter, or abolish but they are obliged to fulfill them. The Legislature stands in another capacity, what is called judicial, between the Union at large and those creditors with whom she has entered into stipulations; there can be no other solemn judge on such occasions, because no court of law is capable of giving redress; they cannot issue an execution against the sovereign power, and enforce their decrees; therefore, any creditor who has money due to him from the State, has a right, by petition, to apply to the Legislature, who has the sole power of doing him justice. When applied to in that manner, the Legislature has a right to examine, or appoint another to examine, how far the claim is just or unjust: this power has been exercised, with respect to the greatest part of the claims against the United States. There has been a liquidation of these accounts, and the specie value has been ascertained of the depreciated security.

When bills of credit were first emitted, it was declared that they should be redeemed with specie, indeed they passed as such at first; but the opinion of their real value was changed by common consent; those that were put into the Continental loan offices were always payable in the same species of money. If they had been paid in paper currency, the owners of them would have suffered a loss and injury: in justice, therefore, to the holders, the Government agreed to fix the value of the loans according to the current rate of paper bills, at the time they were left in the office: all certificates were ordered to be liquidated in this manner; the same could not be done in favor of those who had left their other property with the public, and took the Continental bills as a security; because they passed as a circulating medium, and went from one hand to another, by which means every one who received them, and kept them, though a small space of time, suffered loss; in that way it operated as a tax, and perhaps as equitable and as just a one as could have been any way apportioned; therefore it could not have been supposed equitable, that the last possessor should receive for these bills the nominal sum in specie. The Government, therefore, interfered in order to do justice; but when they had entered into a contract, founded on specie value, liquidated and ascertained, I do not see but the public are bound by that contract, as much as an individual, and that they cannot reduce it down in either principal or interest, unless by an arbitrary power, and in that case there never will be any security in the public promises. If we should now agree to reduce the domestic debt to four per cent. the world may justly fear that we may, on some future occasion, reduce it to two. If this Government once establishes such a principle, our credit is inevitably gone forever. I presume the gentleman does not found his motion upon the idea that there has been fraud and injustice committed on the one side, or imbecility or oversight on the other; if there was, it would be a good reason why an inquiry should take place in such cases. But though the Legislature may judge of accounts exhibited against the Government, and determine on them, their power ought not to be extended to judge of those already acknowledged; unless it be for the special reasons which I have just mentioned. From these considerations, I should be inclined to vary the motion for amendment, and insert the word liquidated before domestic debt, so as to provide permanent funds for the payment of interest on the liquidated part of the debt only.

Mr. GOONHUE asked the gentleman, whether an individual ought to suffer for the fault of Government during the late war? In consequence of an impaired credit, the United States were obliged to give, on some occasions, acknowledgments for more than the real value of the commodity. These securities depreciated, and were sold for a sum less than the value of the goods they had been given for; but is that a reason why we should refuse, when we have it in our power to discharge them according to our promise? He presumed, that if the persons who furnished the army with supplies, had conceived that Congress meant to avoid the full payment of the stipulated price, they would not have got the supplies at double the rate they procured them. If it was the intention of gentlemen to take advantage of the depreciated state of the securities, it would be wisest to defer all further consideration of the subject at present, for the purpose of availing ourselves of a still greater depreciation, which such a measure would inevitably bring about.

Mr. FITZSIMONS said, that it was not his idea that the committee should pledge themselves to any particular rate of interest; the proposition was a general one, and pledged them to nothing more than making a permanent provision for the payment of the interest, and gradual discharge of the principal. He hoped, therefore, that gentlemen would not object to it from a supposition that they would pledge themselves, by giving it their support, to vote hereafter for six, five, four, or three per cent.

Mr. SCOTT—A great deal has been said on a stage of principle that must be attended to in some state of this business; but gentlemen have been led into a more extensive discussion on the doctrine of discrimination than I had any idea of when I proposed the amendment. It has been urged by some of the gentlemen, that however just my principle is, that the Legislature is in the quality of an arbitrator, yet we cannot adopt the amendment; others again have said, that the debt is a contract between the Government and the individual, and that we being parties we cannot be judges; for it is contrary to the principles of law, that we should be judges in our own cause. If, in national transactions like this, interesting to our own citizens only, the Government is to be supposed one party, and the individual the other party, I would ask the gentleman who is the judge? Can two parties exist in a well organized Government, to dispute about property, and have no judge? The very idea must induce the gentleman to abandon his ground. It has been said, as the foundation of an opinion, that there is a great similitude between a certificate and a bond that is brought into court to demand payment upon; that no opposition can be made; that no plea can be entered; but I would wish to ask the gentleman who made the remark, as a professional man, whether the want of consideration would not be a good plea? In Courts of Equity, relief can be given against prima facie evidence.

The honorable gentleman from New York (Mr. LAWRENCE) is opposed to the amendment, because of the impropriety of going into a second liquidation of the debts. I did not expressly say, whatever my ideas may be, that I wished for a second liquidation. It was not necessary for my purpose, that I should have expressed such a desire, because it is very well known, that there are debts, to a very considerable amount, unliquidated. He urged this as a reason why we ought to defer the present measure; because, going into a provision for a part of the debt only, may put it out of our power to make an equal provision for those who are equally deserving. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, who followed the amendment, supposes, that in contracts of this kind, the Government becomes personified; that doctrine is supported on principles different from what I have heard supported on this floor. I remember, on a subject somewhat different from this to be sure, to have heard it said, that a political body was a body without a soul; if you make it a person, it must be a person without a soul; if such, it is not the subject of any moral obligation.

But I believe the distinction I took between the situation in which the Government stands, between the foreign and domestic creditors, has not been adverted to. Suppose, in time of war, the late Congress had found themselves under the necessity to enter into a contract with twenty of our fellow-citizens, which they afterwards discovered would bring absolute ruin upon the rest, could they not attempt a modification of such contract? Is there any power of Government more frequently exercised than that of interfering with and modifying private contracts? In London, houses have been razed to their foundations; men's lands have been taken from them, and yet it was never thought that the Government ever acted wrong in the exercise of authority; private property must not only be subject to a change of shape, but sometimes to an absolute extinguishment, rather than a nation should sink, or the public safety be endangered. This power has been exercised at home; paper money, at one time, passed current, and was of value nearly equal to gold and silver; but the value expressed on the face of it was that of specie itself. What did the Government do when the depreciation had extended itself to a great degree? They laid violent hands upon it, and it was scaled. Was that a violation of the public faith? If so, was it not necessary and inevitable? Why, then, is this the only contract that cannot be violated without a breach of public faith, or the loss of public credit?

All that I am now saying is not an argument that this power should be exercised, but that it ought to be, if justice requires it. If justice does not call for the exercise of it, we may boldly assert, that some of the claims and clamors we have heard have been ill-founded. I will go no further into the subject at present, but confine myself to state to the committee, that my object is to be acquainted with the amount of the public debt before we provide permanent funds for the payment of it.

Mr. LIVERMORE.—My first objection against the resolution, as proposed by the gentleman near me, (Mr. FITZSIMONS,) was that I did not clearly understand the meaning of it, but now he has explained it; I understand what his intention is, yet I think it would be saving time and leading the committee to the main question, if we were to take into consideration the object which I attended to, namely, a reduction of the interest of the domestic debt. I would therefore move to modify the first resolution, so as to introduce the words, "a certain rate," before "interest," which would show our intention to reduce it, and then it might be filled up with three or four, as gentlemen may think proper.

Mr. BOURNOR.—I am a friend to the discussion of every principle on which the great business before us may be supposed to turn, because I have a great desire that the public, as well as ourselves, may be satisfied with their propriety. This leads me again to notice the arguments which have been urged in favor of considering this body as judges or arbitrators between the public and the individuals who have claims upon the public.

It must appear, to the satisfaction of every unprejudiced mind, from the resolutions of the late Congress, that they acknowledge themselves a party on behalf of the public, to every engagement they entered into for services, supplies, or moneys loaned. If then it is admitted that the late Congress were parties to the contract, we must agree that our situation is precisely the same, because we stand in their shoes; and in my former argument I urged, if we are parties we cannot be judges. But the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania answered this observation by saying, there can be no parties without judges, and who are to be our judges? The Constitution will answer him that question. The Judicial power of the United States is vested in the Supreme Court; no Judicial power can be exercised by the Legislature. If this is not the case, I ask whether, in the reason of things, a Legislature ought to interfere or modify a contract to which they are parties? Whether it would not be subversive of the great ends of their institution? No case, I believe, can warrant an interference, unless it is where the whole interest of the community is at stake, and likely to be injured. I, therefore, take it for granted, that in every case where no fraud is committed, (for if fraud is committed, I agree with the gentleman that it vitiates the whole,) the contract remains inviolably binding.

I mentioned also the case of a bond, and supposed that we were bound to the punctual payment of Government notes, as much upon their presentation, as a person would be bound to the payment of a bond, when it is exhibited in court. The same gentleman has appealed to me, as a professional man, to say, whether the want of consideration would not be a plea against it? I answer him, that the want of consideration in a bond, under seal, unless it was under a particular statute, or for the performance of an unlawful thing, would not be a plea. The gentleman has also adduced the case of the paper money, to show that we have a right to interfere, and modify the contract. Now, in order to understand this matter, we ought to consider that Government was contracting with an individual; that the individual, as a party, had as much to say in the contract as the purchaser. If I come to you, and offer to purchase of you a bushel of wheat, the value of which is one dollar, and I offer to give you my note for it at that price, you tell me, no, I will not take it, for your credit is not equal to it; you shall give me twenty dollars, because that, on your credit, is no more than equal to one dollar; if I give you the price that you hold the wheat at, is it not settled between the contracting parties, that the note for twenty dollars is, in fact, no more than one dollar? And having been fixed, by mutual consent, to be of that value, there is no impropriety in its being declared so by either. If the Government, in such a case, finds that it will work an evil of the most enormous magnitude, to discharge those notes which have been paid out, not at twenty for one, but at one hundred for one, at their nominal value, they are not to be blamed for scaling them. Now, are these two cases alike? The certificates that were issued were given for the real specie value of the commodity, or service, or they were on a liquidation of a depreciated currency they had before received. What pretext can there be set up for a re-investigation of claims so certainly decided on? The money that was due, as I have supposed, to the person for his bushel of wheat, might have been paid off in Continental bills of credit, when the depreciation was at forty, fifty, or a hundred for one; but, in this case, Government would have done an act of injustice, they would have paid the man but half a dollar instead of a whole one. But the Government acted more generously, they agreed to give the value at the time the supplies were furnished, or the loans made. Now, can this be brought as a precedent why we should abridge the claims of the holders of the public securities? We cannot interfere, unless it arises from national necessity, that the community would be injured by doing them justice.

But is there any gentleman on this floor, who will presume to say, that such a necessity exists? The public ability is confessedly equal to the demands of its creditors; yet, from motives of convenience and expediency, it may be proper to attempt a modification of the national debt, with the consent of the creditors; and if this can be obtained, will any gentleman oppose it upon principles of honor, justice, or policy? On such an occasion, it is prudent to provide a variety of terms, because different offers may meet the approbation of different minds. This variety, I take it, is held out in the report of the Secretary; and the debt released, in either way, will be as much the child of consent, as the original engagement at the first contract.

The gentleman, as an inducement for us to follow the example of other nations, has told us that the Parliament of England has razed houses, and appropriated the property of individuals to the public service. This is all true, sir; but the Parliament were no parties to the contract by which those houses or lands were held; so have we a right to bind the citizens, in cases where they all stand equal, and where we ourselves shall not be particularly the gainers.

His last argument was, requiring us to show why this contract between the public creditors and the United States was different in its qualities from every other? By every other, I presume, he meant the cases referred to, respecting the Parliament of Britain and the paper money of America. I think I stated this sufficiently clear before; they are widely different, because Congress is a party to the contract, in the other they were not. So, on the principle of honor, we are bound to fulfil what we have engaged to perform; on the principles of justice, we are bound to pay what we owe; and, on principles of policy, we ought to discharge the interest of our present debt, in order that when public exigencies require it, we may borrow money with greater facility. We have no right, by our conduct, to put it out of the power of the United States hereafter to defend themselves, and unless we support the credit of America by a just performance of our engagements, we shall depreciate her credit to so low a state, as to prevent her from hereafter obtaining any future loans.

Mr. FITZSIMMONS.—I apprehend my colleague has taken for granted, what has not appeared in evidence, that there is a great part of the domestic debt unliquidated. I doubt the truth of such an opinion. We are not authorized to entertain it from any thing contained in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. The unliquidated debt therein spoken of, amounts to but two millions of dollars, and that chiefly arises from the old Continental money, which is not yet brought into the Treasury, and this sum is so small, that I think there is little danger, that in making our provision now for the payment of the interest, we shall so far exhaust the resources of our country as to disable us from making provision for the remainder, when it is ascertained; indeed, the accounts which are not liquidated, appear to me to be very trifling; because the two millions of dollars, mentioned in the report, are the greater part of them supposed to arise from seventy-eight millions of the old Continental dollars, yet outstanding; and these, at forty dollars for one, amount to pretty nearly that sum.

Mr. JACKSON.—If there is no part of the debt of the United States unliquidated, besides the two millions which the gentleman alludes to, yet there is a very considerable part of what is in contemplation to fund, as Continental debt, not at present ascertained. I mean the State debts. The Secretary himself had no evidence before him, from which he could make a probable guess of the amount; if these are to be assumed by the General Government, I presume the General Government ought to be at liberty duly to ascertain them; and, therefore, the amendment proposed by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania ought to be admitted.

The honorable gentlemen who are in opposition, contend, that no sort of discrimination ought to take place; yet from what they have let fall, on this occasion, I am led to believe that they favor that part of the report of the Secretary which makes a discrimination, in fact, equal to a loss of one-third of the principal. What will hold good in one case ought to hold good in another, and a discrimination might take place upon the same principles, between those to whom the Government was originally indebted, and who have never received satisfaction therefor, and those who had nothing to do with the Government in the first transaction; but have merely speculated, and purchased up the evidence of an original debt. Some gentlemen think, that the claims of this latter class merit a greater degree of attention, because, by their actions, they seem to have evinced a greater degree of confidence in the Government than those who sold them. But, sir, these men have had more information, they have been at the seat of Government, and knew what was in contemplation before citizens of other parts of the Union could be acquainted with it. There has been no kind of proportion of knowledge between the two classes—to use the expression of a British Minister, the reciprocity has been all one side. The people in this city are informed of all the motions of Government; they have sent out their money, in swift sailing vessels, to purchase up the property of uninformed citizens in the remote parts of the Union. Were those citizens acquainted with our present deliberations, and assured of the intention of Congress to provide for their just demands, they would be on an equal footing; they would not incline to throw away their property for considerations totally inadequate. Such attempts at fraud would justify the Government in interfering in the transactions between individuals, without a breach of the public faith; but this, sir, is not the object of the present motion, it only goes so far as to ascertain the amount of the debt, before we make provision for the payment; and this appears to me to be proper upon every principle of justice and discretion.

Mr. STONE thought, if we made no effort to pay the debt until it was wholly liquidated, it would be a work of time, and that it would be unjust to refuse to settle with those who had settled their accounts, because there were some of our creditors who had hitherto neglected to bring them in.

Mr. SEDGWICK feared the consequences, were the present Congress to disperse without providing adequate funds for the support of public credit; he believed every gentleman's mind was impressed with the same idea; that, therefore, a procrastination upon the principle of liquidation would be extremely injurious.

Mr. WHITZ did not understand the full extent of the amendment, nor of the original proposition; he wished the committee to investigate the subject very fully before they came to a decision, because much depended on doing what is right.

Mr. BURKE wished the question postponed till to-morrow, as it was a subject of such high importance. He moved the committee to rise; whereupon, the committee rose, and reported progress.

WEDNESDAY, February 10.

The memorial of Robert Morris being read a second time, it was ordered to be entered on the Journal, and that the subject-matter of it be referred to a select committee, composed of Messrs. MADISON, SEDGWICK, and SHERMAN.

PUBLIC CREDIT.

The House again went into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. BALDWIN in the Chair, on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SCOTT's amendment being still under consideration.

Mr. SCOTT.—Some time was spent yesterday in the consideration of this subject; in my opinion, that time was not ill spent, nor would two or three days more be ill spent in discussing the question, for it involves in it the whole doctrine of discrimination and liquidation. If these two great points are once settled, the way will be clear and open before us to proceed to the discussion of the report; for, if the principles of the report are good, I believe the plan itself is good. I believe, upon the principles which it holds forth, that it is wisely and judiciously drawn out, and does great honor to the officer who framed it. But it is incumbent on us to examine its principles before we adopt it; if they do not consist with equity and justice among the several inhabitants of the Union, they must be rejected. Now, I doubt whether they consist with that equity and justice; I think there are others on this floor who have their doubts also. I wish, therefore, that we should coolly examine those principles, consult our judgment and understanding, and when we have collected all the information we can get from each other, we may determine; and when we have determined this, and the two grand points I have mentioned, our business will be easy.

In support of the principles held out in the report, it is said that a solemn contract is entered into that cannot be violated; that the debt is ascertained and cannot be extinguished, but by the absolute payment of what is acknowledged to be due. Now, I doubt whether the necessary commitments of a contract to the amount mentioned on the face of the paper, really accompanies the public securities. Let us revert back to the time that this contract was entered into. At the close of the war, at the commencement of issuing final settlements, there was a demand against the United States for real and essential services rendered; the claimants came forward, and asked something for their demand. Congress, having no money to give them, offered something; what? A certificate to a certain nominal amount; nay more, of a certain known value; the nominal amount was twenty shillings, the certain known value was two and six-pence. Did the soldier accept of this offer? Yes. On what principle did he accept it? He knew it was putting the capstone on the building which he had erected by his labor and cemented with his blood. I have done you service, said he, to the amount of twenty shillings, but you are poor and unable to pay me; I will accept now of your two and six-pence, and give you a discharge. Thus, the soldier who had, through blood and slaughter, established the liberties of his country, crowned the whole by the sacrifice of pecuniary emoluments. His consent was given to the contract, and he received two and six-pence in the pound. Now, if there is any other contract existing like this, I cannot see it. The soldier never received it, nor the officer who handed it out, never believed it to be worth more than two and six-pence in the pound. It was like compounding a debt by the consent of the creditor, and there an equal liquidation ought to take place. If this reasoning is right, we know the value at once of our paper currency; and if it is not right, I would wish to know upon what principle of rationality, a rate can be established for the value of our certificates.

Mr. Chairman, I do not lead, nor have I vanity enough to be the champion of a party, I disdain all such ideas; what I now advance I throw out merely for consideration. I am willing always to receive information. Let me be convinced of the existence of a contract, before I agree that provision ought to be made upon the principles of there being one. But suppose for a moment that such a contract exists, and that it is inviolable, let us look at the first contractors, and see how it will operate in point of justice and equity. Those heroes who compounded their claims for the one-eighth, (for this was the value at which they received and passed the evidences of the debt,) who lost the other seven-eighths, and who are still willing it should be sunk, from whom we do not hear a word of clamor, they have added this to their other sacrifices; but there is a clamor, and from whence comes it? It comes from those who are now possessed of the Government paper; they are not content with passing it to the next hand for the same value at which they received it; they must have a profit eightfold, or they will not be satisfied. But how is this to be paid them? As certificates have no intrinsic value, the owners of them have no right to put their hands into the pockets of individuals, and extract money for them. The Government has the power; but the Government will not wrong one individual to do more than justice to another. Will they even wrong an individual to do strict justice to another? They ought not. But by the plan proposed, the soldier who received two shillings and six-pence for a security of the nominal value of twenty shillings, will be subject to the payment of five shillings towards the redemption of that evidence for which he got but half a crown.

From what I have said on this point, it will appear that I am of opinion, that a new scale of depreciation ought to be made, that would apply to certificates as former scales applied to paper money. Nor will their being deemed final settlements destroy the position; for it is a notorious fact, that for the first paper money that was issued, the public received the value of gold and silver. National policy and equity, when by mutual consent they had depreciated, properly induced Congress afterwards to say, that they should pass at a lower rate. Had not that policy been adopted, the community must have been inevitably ruined; the loss operated as a public tax, and injured no person; for it lost its value in the hands of every one, the same as if it had been contributed in payment for the support of Government.

Another reason urges me to adopt this principle rather than the one contained in the plan. When the amount of the public debt is ascertained, I could not pretend to cut the proprietor short of six per cent. interest. I think the same interest ought to be given which was offered, and which induced the holder to vest his money in this way. It would be doing more justice to him to abridge the principle, and to give him the full interest, than it would be to reverse the case.

That part of the amendment which is supposed to look like a delay in providing permanent funds for the discharge of the debt, is supported on a variety of considerations. I do not think we can go into funding the public debt until we know what it amounts to. One part we know is liquidated; but we do not know what the real value of that part is. It is called two millions of dollars; but there are seventy-eight millions of old Continental dollars still in circulation. A question will arise, if we determine that Government can make no alteration in the value of the paper she has issued, and plighted the public faith for the redemption of, whether the real value of these seventy-eight millions of dollars is, according to the nominal value, or as the Secretary supposes them to be, two millions only?

On this point, I could raise this inquiry, what was the idea of the Secretary of the Treasury when he used those words? Did he advert to the scale of depreciation which was fixed by the late Congress at forty for one? It is probable he did. It has been said that a public acknowledgement of money due on the balance of account is like a bond. Though I am not able to discover in what this likeness consists, yet if final settlements partake of the nature of bonds, I presume it will be admitted that paper bills are, to all intents and purposes, good notes of hand; no plea in justice or equity can be set up against the payment of one, that would not be admitted against the payment of the other. If at any time the public necessities have compelled the Government to declare them depreciated, I presume, when those necessities no longer exist, that they ought to return to their first value, and have the same force as if they had been unaffected by Legislative interference. What would be the consequence of funding the public debt under these impressions? The inconsiderable two millions would be found to amount to eighty millions. This consideration urges me to an ardent wish that we may be cool and deliberate in weighing the present question.

The doctrine held forth that the present possessor stands in the place of the original holder, is what I do not perfectly comprehend; I think there is a difference. There would be a difference before a National Court of Equity; that Court I now bring you before—and one distinction I ground on this simple consideration, that you cannot do what is termed justice to the present holder; for without doing an injury to the original holder; for out of his pocket must come more than he received for what the nation owed him. This certainly is not the part which a Legislature ought to act, who has an equal care of the whole, when we have it in our power to do strict justice to the one, without doing an injury to the other.

Shall I be told, that there are many of those characters, whom I have spoken so highly of, veteran soldiers and brave officers, who hold sentiments different from those I am now advocating? I believe there are men who were once brave soldiers, who are now become speculators. I do not think it a crime that a man should speculate in the funds; but when we hear his opinion and attend to his language, we are led to believe, that it is not the opinion or the language of the soldier, but those of the speculator; consequently, they ought to have no weight on our minds, in determining a question in which they are interested.

Mr. HARTLEY.—I am opposed to the amendment, not only on account of the mode of expression used in it, but also on account of the very reasons urged by the gentleman in support of it. My colleague considers his principles right, and supposes those who differ from him in sentiment, to entertain different ones; I happen to be one of those who entertain a different sentiment from him; I am also one of those to whom he has alluded, having been in the late army, though I never speculated in public securities. As I differ so much in sentiment from him, and would not willingly give a silent vote on the occasion, I beg leave to state my reasons for it. At our last session we gave assurances to the public, that we would take up the subject of providing the means for the support of public credit, by providing the means of paying our public debts. It was well known then to every gentleman in this House, that many of the certificates were in the hands of those who had purchased them; yet, I believe the idea of making a discrimination never entered into the contemplation of any gentleman, at least nothing was said that indicated such an intention; nor was it suggested that before this could be done, a reliquidation ought to take place. If that principle be just, and must be carried into execution, it will take many years before we can complete our promise. I grant that we ought to be certain of the extent of our funds, before we undertake to burden them with the amount suggested in the report of the Secretary. Every gentleman can form some opinion, by contemplating the materials; if we discover that our means are insufficient, let us make it known to the world, and endeavor at a composition upon true principles; but I have not heard it asserted that our means are insufficient. I believe, if we compare them with those of other countries, we shall find them very abundant. Those suggested in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, are but an inconsiderable number of the branches of revenue to which our power extends. I would not touch the funds that present themselves to my mind, unless they were necessary; but I am pretty confident there will be enough left, after making provision for the part of the debt which is ascertained, so that we have little occasion to fear that our present efforts will prevent us from making future provision for that part of the debt which is now said to be unliquidated. This circumstance of our ability greatly enhances the obligation to do justice; which is a principle contrary to what has been established by this House, in their vote of last session, as well as their answer to the President during the present.

With respect to what was said of the public securities being originally issued, and received as worth but 2s. 6d. in the pound, I must totally differ with my colleague. The contracts for which they were given as an acknowledgement, were, many of them, performed three, four, or five years, previous to the time of their being received, and then they were not accepted by the soldiers, willingly, as an equivalent for their services; but Congress forced them to accept of them as the only alternative. Neither did Congress consider that paper as a discharge of the debt; they only gave it as an evidence of the amount. The soldiers parted with them, to be sure, for what they could get, and here, I believe, they were frequently hardly dealt with. I always reprobated the idea of purchasing the soldier's rights for such trifling considerations as have been generally given; and I would, at the time they were so imposed upon, have cheerfully given my consent that a discrimination should take place; but, now they have changed hands so often, it is impossible to do it without the greatest degree of injustice if the Government had the power: and this leads me to consider another principle, mentioned by my colleague, that we are arbiters in the case; so far from it, Mr. Chairman, I consider that we are parties, and that one party has no right to change a contract without the consent of the other. We may attempt to modify the interest and mode of payment; but before either of these measures can take effect, the consent of the other party must be obtained. In Great Britain, the principle has been three times tried within a century. In the year 1784, the Chancellor of the Exchequer attempted to modify the unfunded navy and ordnance debt; but, after bringing a bill into Parliament for that purpose, the opposition obliged him to relinquish the measure.

As to the policy of funding, I differ in opinion from the gentleman from Georgia, who has supposed it to be improper and dangerous to introduce such a scheme into a republic. Funding, like every human good, has its certain alloy of evil; abuses may be committed; undeserving individuals may obtain a living by acts practised upon their fellow-men; but these things cannot be avoided in any human system. Funding has carried Great Britain, apparently, to the highest degree of national prosperity; how has she extended her commerce and her manufactures, by means of her paper credit? To what a reputable rank has she raised her character in the scale of nations? compare her with herself when she pursued a different policy; when she collected her revenue upon the spur of the occasion. Look at Frederick the Second, King of Prussia; that Prince accumulated in his coffers specie to the amount of one hundred millions of crowns; but his people were poor and wretched, unable to have assisted him in point of revenue, in case any accident had happened. A capital thus collected was depriving his subjects of the means of promoting productive industry, and leaving them to languish their lives away in military indolence. A nation that has it in her power punctually to pay the interest of the debts she contracts, may always be supplied, in cases of exigency, with what is sufficient for her service, without diminishing the stock of her industrious citizens.

Mr. Spenwick professed himself to be totally disinterested on the subject of discrimination. He was a representative of a part of the United States in which there were very few of these certificates to be found; he believed, therefore, that it would be their particular interest, that as little money should be drawn for the payment of the national debt as was consistent with justice. He felt no difficulty in declaring, that the Government possessed the power to interfere with contracts, public and private. Gentlemen will concur with this idea, if they consider, that the great object of society is self-preservation, and that, consequently, every measure that has a tendency to destroy the social compact is in the power of Government to abrogate and set aside. But it should be assumed as a principle, that this interference of the Government should never take place, but when such are the circumstances of the community, that the mind is convinced that without the measure the public welfare would be endangered. Here, then, arises the question: are we in such circumstances at present as to render an interference, without the consent of the creditors, consistent with the well-being of the society? If gentlemen will demonstrate this to me, I shall concur with them in the idea, that we ought to pursue that line of conduct which we have a precedent for under the old Congress; but if we are not in that situation, we have no right to meddle in the business. The great point, then, to be settled is, what is our capacity of fulfilling the existing engagements of the country to its creditors? On this question there may be a variety of opinions. I am prepared to acquiesce in the decision that shall be made after a due investigation of our resources. But, for myself, I do believe any further procrastination of the business will not only increase the difficulty of a final determination, but will be mischievous and destructive of the general welfare. Nay, I do not know but it will tend to the destruction of the Government itself, by destroying that energy on which all is to depend. I shall not recapitulate the circumstances which have led me to form this conclusion; but if gentlemen will consider the fervor of the public mind on this subject, the impressions that have been made, and what they are still likely to receive from this and other causes, they cannot wonder at my apprehension. The pernicious consequences of speculation will, I fear, be increased by any unnecessary delay; for although that business is of course connected with a transferable debt, and that debt derives its value from it in a great degree, and though the public credit is thereby promoted, yet, when persons are seduced from more useful occupations, to divert their stock, and commence speculating in the public funds, the protective industry of the country must be checked, and great injury be sustained by the Commonwealth.

I would just suggest another idea, with respect to the subject of discrimination. I suppose that it is not contemplated by any gentleman, to make provision for the payment of the public debt, upon the precise terms it was contracted. I have heard no gentleman say, that it would be proper, under all circumstances, to go into such a measure. I suppose the only difference amongst us is, whether we do it by a violent interference of the Government, or whether we shall modify it with the consent of the creditors? I am led to believe, that the latter mode will be the only proper one; and from the public creditors being a set of enlightened men, I am led to expect that they will accept of our reasonable proposals. They would not wish to receive from us engagements beyond what the Government is able to discharge, the value of their certificates will depend upon the public opinion, and the public opinion will depend upon our ability to discharge them; they will contemplate all these consequences, and their concurrence may be expected with certainty.

Mr. BOURNOR.—I am convinced that the principles laid down by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if true, ought to effect the final determination of this question; and if I was satisfied with them, I should clearly vote with him. If I was convinced that the certificates at the time they were given out, were worth no more than 2s. 6d. in the pound, and that the creditors received them at that price, in full discharge of their demands, I should be very loth to raise them to so great a value; I would treat them precisely the same as Continental money. I should think that the public did complete justice by complying with the terms of their contract; while this is a matter of dispute we can never agree in our determination. But if I can show that this is not the case, that he has not looked into the origin of this debt, so as to be well ascertained of the fact, I hope he will give up his opinion, and join with me in the conclusion.

The debt of the United States is of four kinds; first, paper money; second, money lent; third, the allowance for depreciation; and fourth, certificates, or evidences of the debts due from the United States to individuals, for supplies furnished, or services rendered at different periods of the last war. As to the bills of credit, I mentioned yesterday that they stand upon a different footing from the rest; because it was one of the parties who ascertained their depreciation, contrary to the opinion of the other, who had a desire of keeping them up to their nominal value. The money loaned to the United States is a debt which we are bound to pay, on every principle of honor and justice; nor can it be said that the certificate given to the person who loaned the money, was given as a payment in discharge of the debt. With respect to the army, including commutations, I shall beg leave to read two or three resolutions of Congress, to show that Congress had a different idea of the certificates they gave to the officers and soldiers, in evidence of the balance of their account, which is still due. When they were first issued to the soldiers, Congress guarded them from being transferable; but as the soldiers could get nothing for them in that form, upon representation, Congress passed another resolution, by which they were made transferable, in order that the soldier might avail himself of the acknowledgment of Congress in his favor; (the resolutions referred to, were in May, 1783, April, 1784, and June, 1784.) This recurrence to the resolutions of Congress, under which the evidences of the debt were issued, sufficiently explodes a supposition, that they were understood to be worth no more than 2s. 6d. in the pound, at the time they were issued and received. From the personal knowledge I have of the transactions of that time, I can venture to say, that no idea of payment was ever entertained. They were, in fact, and were so considered, evidences of the liquidated and specific sums due to the creditors of the United States. The step which Congress took for the benefit of the army, in making their certificates transferable, so far from accommodating them, would have proved a real injury. If the assignee had supposed himself to stand in a less eligible situation than the assignor, he never would have been induced to have given him the price which he did. If the soldier had received a certificate of twenty shillings, as only 2s. 6d. nobody would have inclined to have given him 2s. 6d. for it, because he could never expect to obtain a repayment of a greater sum, even in such money as Congress should find convenient; upon every principle of assignment of debts or contracts, such an idea ought to be reprobated.

With respect to the idea of reliquidation of the public debt, I venture to say that it is totally impracticable; but were it practicable, and to be entered into, the United States, instead of being gainers, would lose many millions by such a transaction. There have been many instances within my knowledge, where supplies have been furnished, and services rendered; for example, a wagon and horses at forty shillings a day, have been settled for afterwards, when the money had depreciated thirty or forty per cent, and paid in a certificate at the original rate; upon this principle, therefore, it would be highly impolitic to adopt the gentleman's motion.

With respect to the arguments applicable to the general principle of a funded debt, I shall say nothing more than that it is not the question properly before us. But if it was, we are under the necessity of doing something in the business, because it is not a question whether we shall contract a debt for the purpose of funding it; we have one already engaged, which we must provide for.

Mr. SCOTT said, if there was any use in it, he should have no objection that the journals of the late Congress should be read from the beginning to the end, and he apprehended that, in that case, they would find resolves equally solemn, and equally binding, which were afterwards set aside by the scale of depreciation. This would plainly prove that it was considered by the late Congress as just and politic to interfere and determine the value of the present paper.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. SEPOTWICK,) who has spoken since I was last up, has said something more serious, and which is well worthy of due consideration. He has told us that the most alarming consequences are to be apprehended from delaying this important business beyond the present session; that it will destroy the peace of the society, and endanger the Union itself. If that be the case, a skin for a skin, all that a man has he will give to save his life. If we are to be torn to pieces, or if the speculators will cut our throats, if we do not pay them twenty shillings for their half crown, I will consent to what you please; but, before I do this, I should like to know how this is to come about, and how we are to be distressed by the necessary delay of the business.

Mr. SEPOTWICK.—I will express my idea on the point which the gentleman has made an inquiry respecting, in a few words. I said, that I conceived a delay of this business would endanger the peace of the Union by diminishing the energy of the Government, without which this Constitution would be of no value. These are considerations which must appear weighty and important, if justly considered by the committee. A great and respectable body of our citizens are creditors of the United States. There are a variety of opinions prevailing respecting their claims, with respect to funding, discrimination, and interest. This diversity of opinion may probably irritate, and produce heats and animosities, which may terminate in forming factions among the people. The State debts may produce a difference between the General and particular Governments. If the matter is taken up as the business of a party, one may be pitted against the other, until, in the end, they disturb the public tranquillity, or sacrifice the general welfare to opposition and party spirit. Besides this, the reputation, the credit of the Government is at stake; the public expectation is alive to all the measures of Government at the present moment. They expect that justice and equity will be administered as far as the abilities of our country extend; it lies with the Legislature to realize this expectation. If Congress pursue the present inquiry, and come to a determination without delay, the public sentiment credit, it will be gained when we evince, by our conduct, that we are determined scrupulously to comply with our engagements. This is not the work of a day, it will require the experience of years before it arrives at that degree of stability which some gentlemen have in contemplation. But what is the amount of all funding systems? They give a nation capacity to run in debt with the utmost facility; they neither increase the riches, agriculture, commerce, nor happiness of a country. But if it has not money of its own to carry on the mad schemes of ambition, it supplies it with the means of purchasing mercenary soldiers, of shedding the blood of their neighbors, and of cutting so many more throats than they would otherwise be able to do. Factitious, or public credit, founded on schemes of borrowing, appear to me monuments of the folly and vice of mankind.

It would be a desirable thing if we could pay off both the principal and interest of all the debt, according to the specific terms; and I hope an attempt will be made, as far as we have ability, to do it, in order to avoid a perpetual incumbrance.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina.—If we were about to contract debts for the purpose of funding them, the observations of the gentleman from Georgia would apply; but we have already contracted them, and the only question is, shall we fund or pay? We must do one or the other. With respect to the remark of Blackstone, he is writing of an enormous public debt when he mentions it as injurious, because he expressly says, that "a certain proportion of debt seems to be highly useful to a trading people; but what proportion that is, it is not for me to determine." To be sure he adds, afterwards, "that the present magnitude of our national incumbrances very far exceeds all calculations of commercial benefit, and is productive of the greatest inconveniences." And here I agree with him: but our public debt is not of such enormous magnitude as to counterbalance the good effects of throwing out such a quantity of a stable paper as will answer all the purposes of a circulating medium.

Mr. GERRY.—The amendment seems to be grounded on arguments tending to show a distinction between the foreign and domestic debt, which I believe does not exist in reality; and an observation has been made by the gentleman from Georgia that I should be sorry to find generally received. It is, that American independence was principally established by foreign loans. To ascertain this point, which I consider of some importance, it will be necessary to contrast the sums advanced by foreigners with the amount of the domestic debt. If gentlemen turn to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, they will find that the foreign loans, with the interest due thereon, are estimated at $11,710,378, the Federal liquidated domestic debt, without interest, amounts to $27,383,917; the interest due thereon, with the unliquidated part, is $15,030,168, in all, $42,144,085. The domestic State debts are about $25,000,000. So that the whole of the present domestic debt amounts to $67,244,085, a sum nearly curities are possessed by our own creditors, it will have the effect I mentioned before, it will take a capital from productive labor, and vest it in unproductive labor, if the term may be admitted; like an ignis fatuus, it will deceive us, and lead us and our posterity into a wilderness of politics, from which we shall never be able to extricate ourselves.

The Secretary has told us, in his report, that exigencies in Government may require new loans; and that we ought, therefore, so to establish our credit as to be enabled to borrow when necessary. Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, it would be politic to order our affairs in such a manner as to obtain all our supplies by taxation, because the people, feeling the effect of expensive measures, would be a check in restraining the General Government from running into extravagance. The opinion of Blackstone is corroborated by another writer of great eminence, Smith. In his Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations, he declares that the practice of funding has endeavored every State which has adopted it; and he asks, "If it is likely that, in Great Britain alone, a practice which has brought weakness or desolation into every country should prove altogether innocent?" If such are the opinions of well-informed men, we ought to consider well what we are about before we take such a dangerous leap in the dark. I have a great regard for the honor and credit of the United States, and I would not precipitately adopt a measure which must, in the end, destroy both; for, when national debts have once been funded, and accumulated to a certain degree, there is scarcely, I believe, a single instance of their having been fairly and completely paid. The liberation of the public revenues, if it has ever been brought about at all, has always been brought about by a bankruptcy; sometimes by an avowed one, but always by a real one, though frequently by a pretended payment.

Mr. STONE.—If we, by adopting the amendment proposed by the gentleman over the way, (Mr. SCOTT,) say we will not provide for the payment of the public debts until they are ascertained and duly liquidated, it amounts to a declaration that, at this session, we will not enter upon it. Now, whatever idea I have of a funding system, as to its advantages or disadvantages to the interest of the United States, I would not be willing to delay making a proper provision for paying what we have in our power to pay to the public creditors. I am willing, though, before this is done, to go into a full and candid examination of the principles of a permanent system, and to ascertain whether our situation will be mended by it. For my part, sir, I expect very little advantage from schemes of revenue; it is the strong bias of my mind, that all such schemes are unequal to our situation. We are not, like Britain, obliged to subsidize upon public credit. Therefore, public credit is not the first object of our Government, it is but a secondary consideration. No paper schemes, that tend in other countries to gain a factitious credit to the Government, are necessary here. If the United States acquire will be brought to a point, and a general acquiescence may be expected; but if it is postponed to a future session, such may be the effect of faction and disappointment during the recess, that the probability is, that no one party will comprise a sufficient number to comprehend the majority of the whole.

Mr. JACKSON.—Do not gentlemen think there is some danger on the other side? Will there not be grounds of uneasiness when the soldier and meritorious citizen are called upon to pay the speculator more than ten times the amount they ever received from him for their securities? I believe, Mr. Chairman, there is more just reason of alarm on this than on the other side of the question.

A gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. HARTLEY) has noticed my arguments of yesterday, respecting a funding system. I beg leave to make a few observations in answer to him. He has said, that a funded debt is of great advantage to a nation, and has adduced the situation of England as a proof, founded on experience. But England is a solitary example, and the force of that example dwindles into nothing, if we examine into the real cause of her seeming affluence. She does not owe much of her respectability to her national debt; she owes the most of it at present to the troubles of other countries, and when those have subsided, the bubble of her credit may blow up, as did the South Sea project, for Government stock can never be considered as cash. The stock employed in agriculture, commerce, and manufactures may, by great prospects of advantage, be diverted into the hands of brokers, for the purpose of speculating further in the funds; but no real addition will be made to the means of productive industry, nor was any thing of this kind contemplated at the time funding was first introduced into England. We learn from Blackstone, that the reason for establishing a national debt, was in order to support a system of foreign politics, and to establish the new succession at the Revolution; because it was deemed expedient to create a new interest, called the moneyed interest, in favor of the Prince of Orange, in opposition to the landed interest, which was supposed to be generally in favor of the King, who had abdicated the throne. I hope there is no such reason established without the assistance of stock-jobbers. We ought to reign universally in the hearts of our fellow-citizens, on account of the salutary tendency of our measures to promote the general welfare, and not depend upon the support of a party, who have no other cause to esteem us but because we realize their golden dreams of unlooked-for success.

Another argument in favor of an American funding system, may be urged from the probability of drawing considerable sums from Europe into this country. If Europeans send us their money to purchase the principal, let us remember that they take that very money back as interest, and at a rate which abundantly indemnifies them for the loan. On the other hand, if the public se-six times as much as the foreign debt. From this statement alone, it does not appear that our independence was established by foreign loans. But the disproportion will appear still greater, if we pursue the subject. By referring to the journals of Congress of 1776, a period, when there was little or no depreciation of the bills of credit, it will appear that Congress emitted that year fourteen millions of dollars, and the sums expended by the States in the same year, if estimated at the proportion stated by the Secretary, between the Federal and State debts, will amount to about eight millions, making the expenditure of 1776 about twenty-two millions of dollars. Our annual expenses during the war were never computed at a less sum than about five millions sterling. Great Britain spent about one hundred millions sterling in the contest: this will average it about twelve and a half millions per annum; and when we take in her unfunded and contingent expenses, it will amount to fifteen millions; so that we cannot, on comparison, suppose we expended less. If, then, it be admitted, that the expenses of the Union were at least twenty-two millions of dollars, the whole expense of the war will be about a hundred and seventy-six millions, to which the foreign loans bear about the proportion of one to sixteen.

Perhaps it will be asked, how was the part of this sum paid which is not now due? I answer, it was sunk in various ways. First, by depreciation, which has operated as a tax, to all intents and purposes, on the citizens of the United States; and also by classing the citizens for the purpose of recruiting the army, by which they were often taxed three hundred dollars as a bounty to every recruit; but, on an average, in Massachusetts, they paid at least two hundred and fifty dollars for those recruited in this way.

Now, it appears from the journals of Congress, that the foreign loans were obtained at such times, and in such sums, as bore no proportion to the domestic exertions. In 1778, the whole sum loaned by foreigners amounted to $583,330; in 1779, to $700,000; in 1780, to a million and a half; in 1781, to $2,300,000. I believe, at that time, our independence was tolerably secure, yet no man can think it was established by the foreign loans. In my opinion, they had little to do with the business; for it must be remembered, that the expense of the United States, on the calculation I have made, amounted, at that time, to a hundred and seventy-six millions of dollars. And, to the end of the war, in loans and subsidies together, we received from foreigners, little more than three millions of dollars. Surely, then, the citizens of America ought to have some credit for their exertions, and we are wrong in attempting to deprive them of the honor of establishing their independence; nor ought it to be supposed that we hold our liberties at the mercy of foreigners.

It has been said, that there ought to be a discrimination between the foreign and domestic debt, because the former lent their money in solid coin, and the latter in a depreciated currency. I know very well that part of this money was loaned in a depreciated state; but it has been reduced to specie value, on a scale fixed by Congress; I therefore presume there is no just reason for discrimination between them. The supplies were also furnished at a rate above specie value; but either they were paid for in Continental money, when the money had further depreciated, or they were paid for in loan-office certificates, issued some time after the purchase, which were likewise liquidated, and here it may be supposed the citizens had the worst of the bargain, because Government fixed the scale of depreciation without consulting the creditor. This, then, does not warrant a discrimination.

Public Credit.

Another reason why we should make a discrimination is, that foreigners loaned their money at four per cent., and the citizens at six per cent. I deny that our foreign loans were procured at four per cent. The sums borrowed of the Royal French Treasury were at five per cent.; and here it will not be improper to observe, in opposition to what has been said, that that kingdom was deeply interested in the event of the war; she expected to succeed in reducing a rival nation; and it would appear to an impartial bystander, that, taking all circumstances together, the loans I now mention ought to have been a subsidy. It would have been no great sacrifice for her if she had given these three millions; nay, I am persuaded she would have subsidized us to the amount of thirty millions, rather than have been defeated in the great object of the war. But the fact is, Mr. Chairman, of the loans procured of individuals some were at four, and some at five per cent. But in order to ascertain the weight of this objection, we ought to consider the time and situation of the lenders. At one time, when the citizens of the United States lent their money, there was a great degree of danger that they would be conquered and made slaves. We were without resources or alliance, contending against one of the most potent nations of Europe. At another time, though we were in alliance with France, the exertions of Britain were such as to render the event doubtful: when the French loans were made the monarch thought little of the hazard, as he had embarked in the war. Money was procured in Holland when guaranteed by France, Spain, and America was joined in the war by France, Spain, and Holland. It therefore appears to me, that four per cent. was a better interest at that time than six per cent. was at the other. Besides this, the creditors of the United States lent their money, and left it with the Government to fix its value. Surely, then, there is a difference between the foreign and domestic creditors, but it is in favor of the latter. Add to this, that the foreign creditor has been duly paid his interest, without loss: the same was stipulated to the domestic creditor, but has he received it? A few years it was paid in bills on France, some in depreciated paper, and since that in indents, depreciated from fifty to ninety per cent. Here, then, again the domestic creditor has had the worst of the bargain.

It has been said we ought to postpone the present business, in order to have time to convert our Western Territory into cash, for the purpose of paying our debts. I would ask the gentleman whether, if he had contracted a debt with a person, and given his bond for three years, and promised to pay annually the interest thereon, and the person had patiently waited ten years for it, without calling on him, because he knew his affairs were deranged; but finding his circumstances improved, and that he is in a capacity to pay, at least the interest, he were to call upon him and say, "Sir, I should be glad to receive my bond, which has been so long due, or if it is inconvenient to pay the principal, I beg you to assign funds out of which I may, in future, receive my interest;" whether he would tell him, and it would be satisfactory, "Sir, I think such a provision will be contrary to my interest; I have some vacant lands in some part of the world, which are worth money; but until I can sell them, and get cash for them, I cannot think of making the provision you require." Would not the creditor reply, "Sir, I have nothing to do with your land, here is your contract, which should have been discharged long ago; before your lands are sold, I and my family may be in our graves, for we have nothing to subsist on but your note, and we shall be starved to death if we have to wait any longer." The same will hold good with respect to the liquidation of the accounts. "What," says the man, "have I to do with your other accounts? You and I have settled, and I have your acknowledged debt for the balance; you may put me off for ever, by telling me you have not yet ascertained and duly liquidated all you owe. Indeed, if you mean to pay nothing until you have settled with all, it may be your interest that such a settlement should never take place."

My honorable friend from Georgia has evinced a strong desire to pay the debts of the Union, though he does not approve of funding them; but I conceive it to have been an implied contract, that the debt should be funded if it was not paid. It appears to me, after all the delays and disadvantages the domestic creditor has sustained, we ought to make no discrimination between him and the foreigner. It is contrary to the fact, that a discrimination ought to be made; certainly after he has been thus injured by the fault of the Government, to reduce his property still more, would be unjust; and you may as well reduce his principal as the interest, for the effect is, in either case, the same. I conceive that such a measure never can be agreeable to the people of the United States, because it is inconsistent with justice and common honesty. Why a difference, then, should take place between the domestic and foreign creditors, I cannot see; perhaps it may be thought politic; but I should consider it as a preferable thing to have the esteem and support of the citizens of the Union than to be obliged to apply to foreigners for every aid we may require. The Government must operate upon the people who live under it, not upon foreigners.

With respect to a discrimination among the domestic creditors, the question is not before the committee at this time, I shall therefore pass it by; but I will assure the committee, that I am not influenced by my interest on this question. I think, in my own mind, I can decide as if I was wholly disinterested, though I hold some few certificates in my own name, (and they are all that I hold,) they are to such a trifling amount, that I would cheerfully throw them up and return them to the public, if others would do the same, and destroy at once the subject of altercation.

I hope, whatever the decision of the committee may be, it will be decided on principles of honor and justice; that they will make no distinction or difference; they will not neglect to provide, in as ample a manner for the debt of justice due to their own citizens, as they do for the foreign debt; if they do, the world will suppose that the ultima ratio regum, and not the principles of honor and justice, were the influencing cause.

Mr. JACKSON never meant to derogate from the merit of his country in any thing he said. He knew well the hardships those brave men who had nobly fought and bled to secure the liberties of America had undergone. He had participated in some of them, and no man knew better how to esteem and venerate the patriotic citizens who had risked their all on the contest; but truth was a language dear to his heart, and he could not retract what he uttered by its dictates. He said it was to foreign loans that America was in a great measure indebted for her independence. What was it that purchased the arms and ammunition that enabled her to make successful opposition to the troops of Britain and her mercenary legions? What but the foreign loans? Without those military supplies, how could she have carried on the war? Could paper money buy cannon and muskets of Europeans? They could not. Then it was undoubtedly to foreign loans we owed the means of defence, if not of conquest.

Mr. TUCKER.—I very much applaud the gentleman who made the motion now before the committee, because he has boldly come forward to combat an opinion so generally received in this place, that many thought it could not be controverted by any man possessed of common honesty; and because I am persuaded, that he has done it with an honorable intention of substituting real and substantial justice, in the place of that which he deems to be only the name and the shadow.

Those gentlemen who are the strongest advocates for no discrimination whatever between the creditors of the Union, seem to agree in a proposition that effects an important discrimination. They have assented to a resolution to provide adequate funds for the discharge of the foreign debt. This resolution I also agreed to, because I considered such a measure to be extremely proper; but now they propose to adopt a resolution to vary the terms of the domestic debt. It will be incumbent on those gentlemen to show, that they do not, in this case, make an actual discrimination. If they cannot show this, they allow that some discrimination is proper; then it will rest upon them to show, how far this discrimination ought to go, and whether what they propose is just.

Although it is probable, I differ with the gentleman who moved the amendment; I am inclined to think a discrimination of some kind is equitable and necessary. I believe it may be fairly said, that there are three classes of domestic creditors. The first, those who hold the Continental bills of credit, which have been long out of circulation. Second, those who hold certificates that were given for services or supplies in their own names. And, third, those who hold certificates by purchase. I would wish to consider the obligation to each of these three classes, and whether, in equity, some kind of discrimination may not be made. On a strict and impartial examination, I am inclined to believe they will not appear to be the same. I will now turn to the examination of the first; namely, the holders of the Continental bills of credit. The Secretary of the Treasury has reported in favor of some degree of provision being made for them. But, sir, what is the situation of the people who hold these bills? If I recollect rightly, the face of the bills declares, that the bearer shall be entitled to receive so many Spanish milled dollars as is therein expressed. When these bills were issued, their real value was equal to their nominal value, so person refused, or wished to refuse, them as such; but, in a short time, too large a quantity were issued, and they began to depreciate. Congress then recommended to the several States to pass tender-laws for the support of their credit. This was done by all the States; and they continued, in some of them, to pass as specie under those laws, when they were depreciated twenty, thirty, and forty for one. Those people who received them in this state, suffered a very great loss by an act of the Government, and many were ruined by the measure. When these bills had thus depreciated, Congress passed a resolution calling them in at forty for one. This ordinance of Congress immediately reduced the claims of the first class of creditors by an arbitrary act of power. I do not pretend to say that the measure was unnecessary, but it was rigorous to deprive them of 39-40ths of their claims. Perhaps we cannot return to all the transactions of that time, because it would involve the Government in a thousand difficulties, and produce, perhaps, greater evils than it would remedy. But there remains a claim upon our justice to pay the holders one dollar, at least, for forty. By the act of Congress, which I alluded to before, these bills were thrown out of circulation, and have ever since laid in the hands of individuals. Now, it appears to me, that, in equity, we ought to make all the reparation in our power. Surely, then, we ought to allow interest on the principal from the time the bills were sealed, and forced out of circulation. These creditors, I take it, have a strong claim upon us; because the Government has materially injured them, and the least satisfaction we can give them is to put this part of the debt on the best footing we can; if we cannot do complete justice, let us approximate towards it as the hearts of the people, and feeling their minds animated with the ennobling principle of universal goodwill to men, find a conscious dignity and felicity in the harmony and success attending the exercise of a solid, uniform virtue, short of which the warmest pretensions to public spirit, zeal for our country, and the rights of men, are fallacious and illusive.

provision on these principles; I would, therefore, immediately set about providing funds for their purpose, and pay to the first and second class their full interest; but I believe, if we do this for them, we shall not be able, in our present situation, to provide interest for more than half the principal of the third.

Under this persuasion, as professors of faith in that ever blessed, all-perfect Lawgiver, whose injunctions remain of undiminished obligation on all who profess to believe in him, "whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do you even so unto them;" we apprehend ourselves religiously bound to request your serious Christian attention to the deeply interesting subject whereon our religious society, in their annual assembly, on the tenth month, 1783, addressed the then Congress, who, though the Christian rectitude of the concern was by the Delegates generally acknowledged, yet not being vested with the powers of legislation, they declined promoting any public remedy against the gross national iniquity of trafficking in the persons of fellow-men; but divers of the Legislative bodies of the different States, on this Continent, have since manifested their sense of the public detestation due to the licentious wickedness of the African trade for slaves, and the inhuman tyranny and blood guiltiness inseparable from it; the debasing influence whereof most certainly tends to lay waste the virtue, and, of course, the happiness of the people.

The proposition, in its original form, as introduced by the member from Pennsylvania, (Mr. FITZSIMONS,) appears to me to be inconsistent with the present situation of the United States. After adopting a resolution, declaring that permanent funds ought to be appropriated for the payment of the interest on the domestic debt, to go on and say that we will pay but the two-thirds of that interest, will never be a compliance with our engagements. It is inconsistent with our present situation, because it does not appear, from any estimates made of the resources of the United States, that we are able to pay the full interest of six per cent. on the whole debt, taking into consideration the Continental bills, with the interest already accrued thereon, which, according to my supposition, will amount to about two millions and a half of dollars. It appears from the Secretary's report, that he contemplates no provision for the payment of anything more at present than four per cent., so the resolution is inconsistent with our situation, as well as with the following ones; therefore, it will be necessary, before the question is taken, to modify it, by adding the words, "as shall appear consistent with equity, and the present and improving resources of the nation;" I say consistent with equity, because there may be a discrimination on that principle, in point of time and the present resources, because I think we cannot now make full payment of what I acknowledge to be due; but I add, our improving resources, because I think they will enable us to do complete justice in a short time.

Mr. FITZSIMONS.—If we were now to determine the final question, the observation of the gentleman from South Carolina would apply; but, sir, the present question does not touch upon the merits of the case; it is merely to refer the memorial to a committee, to consider what is proper to be done. Gentlemen, therefore, who do not mean to oppose the commitment to-morrow, may as well agree to it to-day, because it will tend to save the time of the House.

Mr. BURKE moved the following amendment to the original resolution: "provided a discrimination be made between the original holders and their assignees, and that a scale of depreciation be prepared accordingly;" this being seconded, was laid on the table.

Mr. JACKSON wished to know why the second reading was to be contended for to-day, when it was diverting the attention of the members from the great object that was before the Committee of the Whole? Is it because the feelings of the Friends will be hurt to have their affair conducted in the usual course of business? Gentlemen, who advocate the second reading to-day, should respect the feelings of the members who represent that part of the Union which is principally affected by the measure. I believe, sir, that the latter class consists of as useful and as good citizens as the petitioners—men equally friends to the Revolution, and equally susceptible of the refined sensations of humanity and benevolence.

When, on motion, the committee rose, and reported progress.

Why, then, should such particular attention be paid to them for bringing forward a business of questionable policy? If Congress are disposed to interfere in the importation of slaves, they can take the subject up without advisers, because the Constitution expressly mentions all the power they can exercise on the subject.

Mr. FITZSIMONS presented the following Address to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

Mr. SHERMAN suggested the idea of referring it to a committee, to consist of a member from each State, because several States had already made some regulations on this subject. The sooner the subject was taken up he thought it would be the better.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States.

Mr. PARKER.—I hope, Mr. Speaker, the petition of these respectable people will be attended to with all the readiness the importance of its object demands; and I cannot help expressing the pleasure I feel in finding so considerable a part of the community attending to matters of such moment.

The Address of the people called Quakers, in their annual assembly convened:

We consider this subject so essentially and extensively important, as to warrant a hope that the liberty we now take will be understood, as it really is, a compliance with a sense of religious duty; and that your Christian endeavors to remove reproach from the land may be efficacious to sweeten the labor, and lessen the difficulties incident to the discharge of your important trust.

Signed in and on behalf of the Yearly Meeting, for Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, and the Western parts of Maryland and Virginia, held by adjournments from the twenty-eighth day of the ninth month, to the third day of the tenth month, inclusive, 1789, by Nicholas Wain, clerk to the meeting this year.

I believe it will not be deemed unjust to make lous concern to the future prosperity and happiness of the people of America. I think it my duty, as a citizen of the Union, to espouse their cause; and it is incumbent upon every member of this House to sift the subject well, and ascertain what can be done to restrain a practice so nefarious. The Constitution has authorized us to levy a tax upon the importation of such persons as the States shall authorize to be admitted. I would willingly go to that extent; and if any thing further can be devised to discountenance the trade, consistent with the terms of the Constitution, I shall cheerfully give it my assent and support.

Mr. MANISON.—The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. FITZSIMONS) has put this question on its proper ground; if gentlemen do not mean to oppose the commitment to-morrow, they may as well acquiesce in it to-day; and, I apprehend, gentlemen need not be alarmed at any measure it is likely Congress will take; because they will recollect, that the Constitution secures to the individual States the right of admitting, if they think proper, the importation of slaves into their own territory, for eighteen years yet unexpired; subject, however, to a tax, if Congress are disposed to impose it, of not more than ten dollars on each person. The petition, if I mistake not, speaks of artifices used by self-interested persons to carry on this trade; and the petition from New York states a case that may require the consideration of Congress. If any thing is within the Federal authority to restrain such violation of the rights of nations and of mankind, as is supposed to be practised in some parts of the United States, it will certainly tend to the interest and honor of the community to attempt a remedy, and is a proper subject for our discussion. It may be, that foreigners take the advantage of the liberty afforded them by the American trade, to employ our shipping in the slave trade between Africa and the West Indies, when they are restrained from employing their own by restrictive laws of their nation. If this is the case, is there any person of humanity that would not wish to prevent them? Another consideration, why we should commit the petition is, that we may give no ground of alarm by a serious opposition, as if we were about to take measures that were unconstitutional.

Mr. STONE feared that if Congress took any measures indicative of an intention to interfere with the kind of property alluded to, it would sink it in value very considerably, and might be injurious to a great number of the citizens, particularly in the Southern States. He thought the subject was of general concern, and that the petitioners had no more right to interfere with it than any other members of the community. It was an unfortunate circumstance, that it was the disposition of religious sects to imagine they understood the rights of human nature better than all the world besides; and that they would, in consequence, be meddling with concerns in which they had nothing to do. As the petition relates to a subject of a general nature, it ought to lie on the table as information. He would never consent to refer petitions, unless the petitioners were exclusively interested. Suppose there was a petition to come before us from a society, praying us to be honest in our transactions, or that we should administer the Constitution according to its intent, what would you do with a petition of this kind? Certainly it would remain on your table. He would, however, not have it supposed that the people had not a right to advise and give their opinion upon public measures; but he would not be influenced by that advice or opinion to take up a subject sooner than the convenience of other business would admit. Unless he changed his sentiments, he would oppose the commitment.

Mr. BURKE thought gentlemen were paying attention to what did not deserve it. The men in the gallery had come here to meddle in business with which they had nothing to do; they were volunteering in the cause of others, who neither expected nor desired it. He had a respect for the body of Quakers, but, nevertheless, he did not believe they had more virtue or religion than other people, nor perhaps so much, if they were examined to the bottom, notwithstanding their outward pretences. If their petition is to be noticed, Congress ought to wait till counter applications were made, and then they might have the subject more fairly before them. The rights of the Southern States ought not to be threatened, and their property endangered, to please people who would be unaffected by the consequences.

Mr. HARTLEY thought the memorialists did not deserve to be asspersed for their conduct, if influenced by motives of benignity. They solicited the Legislature of the Union to prevent, as far as is in their power, the increase of a licentious traffic; nor do they merit censure, because their behaviour has the appearance of more morality than hear the applications of their fellow-citizens, while those applications contain nothing unconstitutional or offensive. What is the object of the address before us? It is intended to bring before this House a subject of great importance to the cause of humanity; there are certain facts to be inquired into, and the memorialists are ready to give all the information in their power; they are waiting, at a great distance from their homes, and wish to return; if, then, it will be proper to commit the petition to-morrow, it will be equally proper to-day, for it is conformable to our practice; besides, it will tend to their convenience.

Mr. LAWRENCE.—The gentleman from South Carolina says, the petitioners are of a society not known in the laws or Constitution. Sir, in all our acts, as well as in the Constitution, we have noticed this society; or, why is it that we admit them to affirm in cases where others are called upon to swear? If we pay this attention to them, in one instance, what good reason is there for condemning them in another? I think the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. STONE) carries his apprehensions too far, when he fears that negro property will fall in value, by the suppression of the slave trade; not that I suppose it immediately in the power of Congress to abolish a traffic which is a disgrace to human nature; but it appears to me, that, if the importation was crushed, the value of a slave would be increased instead of diminished; however, considerations of this kind have nothing to do with the present question. Gentlemen may acquiesce in the commitment of the memorial, without pledging themselves to support its object.

Mr. JACKSON.—I differ much in opinion with the gentleman last up. I apprehend, if through the interference of the General Government the slave trade was abolished, it would evince to the people a disposition towards a total emancipation, and they would hold their property in jeopardy. Any extraordinary attention of Congress to this petition may have, in some degree, a similar effect. I would beg to ask those, then, who are desirous of freeing the negroes, if they have funds sufficient to pay for them? If they have, they may come forward on that business with some propriety; but, if they have not, they should keep themselves quiet, and not interfere with a business in which they are not interested. They may as well come forward and solicit Congress to interdict the West India trade, because it is injurious to the morals of mankind; from thence we import rum, which has a debasing influence upon the consumer. But, sir, is the whole morality of the United States confined to the Quakers? Are they the only people whose feelings are to be consulted on this occasion? Is it to them we owe our present happiness? Was it they who formed the Constitution? Did they, by their arms or contributions, establish our independence? I believe they were generally opposed to that measure; why, then, on their application, should we injure men, who, at the risk of their lives and fortunes, secured to the community their liberty and property? If Congress pay any uncommon degree of attention to their petition, it will furnish just ground of alarm to the Southern States. But why do these men set themselves up in such a particular manner against slavery? Do they understand the rights of mankind, and the disposition of Providence, better than others? If they were to consult that book, which claims our regard, they will find that slavery is not only allowed, but commended. Their Saviour, who possessed more benevolence and commiseration than they pretend to, has allowed of it; and if they fully examine the subject, they will find that slavery has been no novel doctrine since the days of Cain; but be these things as they may, I hope the House will prevent an alarm to our Southern brethren.

Mr. SENECA.—If it was a serious question whether the memorial should be committed or not, I would not urge it at this time; but that cannot be a question for a moment, if we consider our relative situation with the people. A number of men, who are certainly very respectable, and of whom, as a society, it may be said with truth, that they conform their moral conduct to their religious tenets, as much as any people in the whole community, come forward and tell you, that you may effect two objects by the exercise of a Constitutional authority, which will give great satisfaction. On the one hand, you may acquire revenue, and on the other, restrain a practice productive of great evil. Now, setting aside the religious motives which influence their application, have they not a right as citizens to give their opinion of public measures? For my part, I do not apprehend that any State, or any considerable number of individuals in any State, will be seriously alarmed at the commitment of the petition, from a fear that Congress intend to exercise an unconstitutional authority, in order to violate their rights. I believe there is not a wish of the kind entertained by any member of this body; how can gentlemen hesitate, then, to pay that respect to a memorial which it is entitled to, according to the ordinary mode of procedure in business? Why shall we defer doing that till to-morrow, which we can do to-day; for the result, I apprehend, will be the same in either case.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina.—The question, I apprehend, is whether we will take the petition up for a second reading, and not whether it shall be committed? Now, I oppose this, because it is contrary to our usual practice, and does not allow gentlemen time to consider of the merits of the prayer. Perhaps some gentlemen may think it improper to commit it to so large a committee as has been mentioned; a variety of causes may be supposed to show that such a hasty decision is improper; perhaps the prayer of it is improper. If I understood it right on its first reading, though I be sure I did not comprehend perfectly all that the petition contained, it prays that we should take measures for the abolition of the slave trade. This is desiring an unconstitutional act, because the Constitution secures that trade to the States, independent of Congressional restrictions, for a term of twenty-one years. If, therefore, it prays for a violation of Constitutional rights, it ought to be rejected as an attempt upon the virtue and patriotism of the House.

Mr. BOURNOR.—It has been said, that the Quakers have no right to interfere in this business. I am surprised to hear this doctrine advanced, after it has been so lately contended and settled, that the people have a right to assemble and petition for redress of grievances. It is not because the petition comes from the society of Quakers that I am in favor of the commitment, but because it comes from citizens of the United States who are equally concerned in the welfare and happiness of their country with others. There certainly is no foundation for the apprehensions which seem to prevail in gentlemen's minds. If the petitioners were so uninformed as to suppose that Congress could be guilty of a violation of the Constitution, yet I trust we know our duty better than to be led astray by an application from any man or set of men whatever. I do not consider the merits of the main question to be before us; it will be time enough to give our opinions upon that when the committee have reported. If it is in our power, by recommendation, or any other way, to put a stop to the slave trade in America, I do not doubt of its policy; but how far the Constitution will authorize us to attempt to depress it, will be a question well worthy of our consideration.

Slave Trade.

Mr. SHERMAN observed, that the petitioners from New York stated, that they had applied to the Legislature of that State to prohibit certain practices which they conceived to be improper, and which tended to injure the well-being of the community; that the Legislature had considered the application, but had applied no remedy, because they supposed that power was exclusively vested in the General Government under the Constitution of the United States; it would, therefore, be proper to commit that petition, in order to ascertain what are the powers of the General Government in the case.

Mr. GERRY thought gentlemen were out of order in entering upon the merits of the main question at this time, when they were considering the expediency of committing the petition. He should, therefore, not follow them further in that track than barely to observe, that it was the right of the citizens to apply for redress, in every case in which they considered themselves aggrieved; and it was the duty of Congress to afford redress as far as in their power. That their Southern brethren had been betrayed into the slave trade by the first settlers, was to be lamented; they were not to be reflected on for not viewing this subject in a different light, the prejudice of education is eradicated with difficulty; but he thought nothing would excuse the General Government for not exerting itself to prevent, as far as they Constitutionally could, the evils resulting from such enormities as were alluded to by the petitioners; and the same considerations induced him highly to commend the part the Society of Friends had taken; it was the cause of humanity they had interested themselves in, and he wished, with them, to see measures pursued by every nation, to wipe off the indelible stain which the slave-trade had brought upon all who were concerned in it.

Mr. MADISON thought the question before the gentlemen made it so by their serious opposition. Had they permitted the commitment of the memorial, as a matter of course, no notice would have been taken of it out of doors; it could never have been blown up into a decision of the question respecting the discouragement of the African slave-trade, nor alarm the owners with an apprehension that the General Government were about to abolish slavery in all the States; such things are not contemplated by any gentleman; but they excite alarm by their extended objections to committing the memorials. Gentlemen may vote for the commitment of the petition without any intention of supporting the prayer of it.

Mr. WAITE would not have seconded the motion, if he had thought it would have brought on a lengthy debate. He conceived that a business of this kind ought to be decided without much discussion; it had constantly been the practice of the House, and he did not suppose there was any reason for a deviation.

Mr. PAGE said, if the memorial had been presented by any individual, instead of the respectable body from whom it emanated, he should have voted in favor of a commitment, because it was the duty of the Legislature to attend to subjects brought before them by their constituents; if, upon inquiry, it was discovered to be improper to comply with the prayer of the petitioners, he would say so, and they would be satisfied.

Mr. STONE thought the business ought to be left to take its usual course; by the rules of the House, it was expressly declared that petitions, memorials, and other papers, addressed to the House, should not be debated or decided on the day they were first read.

Mr. BALDWIN felt at a loss to account why precipitation was used on this occasion, contrary to the customary usage of the House. He had not heard a single reason advanced in favor of it. To be sure, it was said the petitioners are a respectable body of men; he did not deny it; but certainly gentlemen did not suppose they were paying respect to them or to the House, when they urged such a hasty procedure. It was contrary to his idea of respect, and the idea the House had always expressed, when they had important subjects under consideration; and, therefore, he should be against the motion. He was afraid that there was really a little volunteering in this business, as it had been termed by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HUNTINGTON considered the petitioners as much disinterested as any persons in the United States; he was persuaded they had an aversion to slavery, yet they were not singular in this; others had the same; and he hoped, when Congress took up the subject, they would go as far as possible to prohibit the evil complained of. But he thought that would be better done by considering it in the light of revenue; when the Committee of the Whole on questions of finance might properly take the subject into consideration, without giving any ground for alarm.

Mr. TUCKER.—I have no doubt on my mind respecting what ought to be done on this occasion; so far from committing the memorial, we ought to dismiss it without further notice. What is the purport of the memorial? It is plainly this, to reprobate a particular kind of commerce, in a moral point of view, and to request the interposition of Congress to effect its abrogation. But Congress has no authority, under the Constitution, to do more than lay a duty of ten dollars upon each person imported: and this is a political consideration, not arising from either religion or morality, and is the only principle upon which we can proceed to take it up. But what effect do these men suppose will arise from their exertions? Will a duty of ten dollars diminish the importation? Will the treatment be better than usual? I apprehend not; nay, it may be worse, because an interference with the subject may excite a great degree of restlessness in the minds of those it is intended to serve, and that may be a cause for the masters to use more rigor towards them than they would otherwise exert: so that these men seem to overshoot their object. But if they will endeavor to procure the abolition of the slave trade, let them prefer their petitions to the State Legislatures, who alone have the power of forbidding the importation. I believe their applications there would be improper; but if they are any where proper, it is there. I look upon the address then to be ill-judged, however good the intention of the framers.

Mr. SMITH claimed it as a right that the petition should lie over till to-morrow.

Mr. BOUNDINOT said, it was not unusual to commit petitions on the day they were presented, and the rules of the House admitted the practice, by the qualification which followed the positive order, that petitions should not be decided on the day they were first read, "unless the House should direct otherwise."

Mr. SMITH declared his intention of calling the yeas and nays, if gentlemen persisted in pressing the question.

Mr. CLYMER hoped the motion would be withdrawn for the present, and the business taken up in course to-morrow; because though he respected the memorialists, he also respected order, and the situation of the members.

Mr. FITZSIMONS did not recollect whether he moved or seconded the motion; but he should not withdraw it on account of the threat of calling the yeas and nays.

Mr. BALDWIN hoped the business would be conducted with temper and moderation, and that gentlemen would concede and pass the subject over for a day at least.

Mr. SMITH had no idea of holding out a threat to any gentleman: if the declaration of an intention to call the yeas and nays was viewed by gentlemen in that light, he would withdraw that call.

Mr. WHITE hereupon withdrew his motion, and the address was ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate had passed a resolution empowering the President of the United States to appoint three commissioners to inquire into the receipts and expenditures of public moneys, during the administration of the late Superintendent of Finance; and to examine and adjust the accounts of the United States with that Department, during his administration, and to report the state thereof to Congress, and to request the concurrence of the House thereto.

PUBLIC CREDIT.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole upon the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. BALDWIN in the Chair.

Mr. BURKE's amendment being under consideration,

Mr. BURKE said, he had brought his motion forward, in consequence of a hasty promise he had given a member of this House; but as he did not mean to support it, or vote for it, he would withdraw it.

Mr. MADISON.—No gentleman, Mr. Chairman, has expressed more strongly than I feel, the importance and difficulty of the subject before us. Although I have endeavored to view it under all its aspects, and analyze it in all its principles, yet have I kept my mind open, and been anxious to aid my own reflections by the reflected light to be expected from gentlemen on this floor who enter into the discussion. For this purpose, I have chosen hitherto rather to be a hearer than a speaker on the subject, and should even at this moment have continued in my seat, but that the turn which the business has taken, renders it requisite for me now, if at all, to trouble the committee with my reflections, and the opinion in which they have terminated.

It has been said, by some gentlemen, that the debt itself does not exist in the extent and form which is generally supposed. I confess, sir, I differ altogether from the gentlemen who take that ground. Let us consider, first, by whom the debt was contracted, and then let us consider to whom it is due. The debt was contracted by the United States, who, with respect to that particular transaction, were in a national capacity. The Government was nothing more than the agent or organ, by which the whole body of the people acted. The change in the Government which has taken place has enlarged its national capacity, but it has not varied the national obligation, with respect to the engagements entered into by that transaction. For, in like manner, the present Government is nothing more than the organ, or agent, of the public. The obligation which they are under, is precisely the same with that under which the debt was contracted; although the Government has been changed, the nation remains the same. There is no change in our political duty, nor in the moral or political obligation. The language I now use, sir, is the language of the Constitution itself; it declares that all debts shall have the same validity against the United States, under the new, as under the old form of Government. The obligation remains the same, though I hope experience will prove that the ability has been favorably varied.

The next question is, to what amount the public are at present indebted? I conceive the question may be answered in a few words. The United States owe the value they have received, which they acknowledge, and which they have promised to pay: what is that value? It is a certain sum in principal, bearing an interest of six per cent. No logic, no magic, in my opinion, can diminish the force of the obligation.

The only point on which we can deliberate is, to whom the payment is really due; for this purpose, it will be proper to take notice of the several descriptions of people who are creditors of the Union, and lay down some principles respecting them, which may lead us to a just and equitable decision. As there is a small part of the debt yet unliquidated, it may be well to pass it by and come to the great mass of the liquidated debt. It may here be proper to notice four classes into which it may be divided:

First. Original creditors, who have never alienated their securities.
Second. Original creditors who have alienated.
Third. Present holders of alienated securities.
Fourth. Intermediate holders, through whose hands securities have circulated.

The only principles that can govern the decision on their respective pretensions, I take to be, 1. Public Justice; 2. Public Faith; 3. Public Credit; 4. Public Opinion.

With respect to the first class, there can be no difficulty. Justice is in their favor, for they have advanced the value which they claim; public faith is in their favor, for the written promise is in their hands; respect for public credit is in their favor, for if claims so sacred are violated, all confidence must be at an end; public opinion is in their favor, for every honest citizen cannot but be their advocate.

With respect to the last class, the intermediate holders, their pretensions, if they have any, will lead us into a labyrinth, for which it is impossible to find a clew. This will be the less complained of, because this class were perfectly free, both in becoming and ceasing to be creditors; and because, in general, they must have gained by their speculations.

The only rival pretensions then are those of the original creditors, who have assigned, and of the present holders of the assignments.

The former may appeal to justice, because the value of the money, the service, or the property advanced by them, has never been really paid to them.

They may appeal to good faith, because the value stipulated and expected, is not satisfied by the steps taken by the Government. The certificates put into the hands of the creditors, on closing their settlements with the public, were of less real value than was acknowledged to be due; they may be considered as having been forced, in fact, on the receivers. They cannot, therefore, be fairly adjudged an extinguishment of the debt. They may appeal to the motives for establishing public credit, for which justice and faith form the natural foundation. They may appeal to the precedent furnished by the compensation allowed to the army during the late war for the depreciation of bills, which nominally discharged the debts. They may appeal to humanity, for the sufferings of the military part of the creditors can never be forgotten, while sympathy is an American virtue. To say nothing of the singular hardship, in so many mouths, of requiring those who have lost four-fifths or seven-eighths of their due, to contribute the remainder in favor of those who have gained in the contrary proportion.

On the other hand, the holders by assignment, have claims, which I by no means wish to depreciate. They will say, that whatever pretensions others may have against the public, these cannot effect the validity of theirs. That if they gain by the risk taken upon themselves, it is but the just reward of that risk. That as they hold the public promise, they have an undeniable demand on the public faith. That the best foundation of public credit is that adherence to literal engagements on which it has been erected by the most flourishing nations. That if the new Government should swerve from so essential a principle, it will be regarded by all the world as inheriting the infirmities of the old. Such being the interfering claims on the public, one of three things must be done; either pay both, reject wholly one or the other, or make a composition between them on some principle of equity. To pay both is perhaps beyond the public ability; and as it would far exceed the value received by the public, it will not be expected by the world, nor even by the creditors themselves. To reject wholly the claims of either is equally inadmissible; such a sacrifice of those who possess the written engagements would be fatal to the proposed establishment of public credit; it would moreover punish those who had put their trust in the public promises and resources. To make the other class the sole victims is an idea at which human nature recoils.

A composition, then, is the only expedient that remains; let it be a liberal one in favor of the present holders, let them have the highest price which has prevailed in the market; and let the residue belong to the original sufferers. This will not do perfect justice; but it will do more real justice, and perform more of the public faith, than any other expedient proposed. The present holders, where they have purchased at the lowest price of the securities, will have a profit that cannot reasonably be complained of; where they have purchased at a higher price, the profit will be considerable; and even the few who have purchased at the highest price cannot well be losers, with a well funded interest of six per cent. The original sufferers will not be fully indemnified; but they will receive, from their country, a tribute due to their merits, which, if it does not entirely heal their wounds, will assuage the pain of them. I am aware, that many plausible objections will lie against what I have suggested, some of which I foresee and will take some notice of. It will be said, that the plan is impracticable; should this be demonstrated, I am ready to renounce it; but it does not appear to me in that light. I acknowledge that such a scale as has often been a subject of conversation, is impracticable.

The discrimination proposed by me, requires nothing more than a knowledge of the present holders, which will be shown by the certificates; and of the original holders, which the office documents will show. It may be objected, that if the Government is to go beyond the literal into the equitable claims against the United States, it ought to go back to every case where injustice has been done. To this the answer is obvious: the case in question is not only different from others in point of magnitude and of practicability, but forces itself on the attention of the committee, as necessarily involved in the business before them. It may be objected, that public credit will suffer, especially abroad; I think this danger will be effectually obviated by the honesty and disinterestedness of the Government displayed in the measure, by a continuance of the punctual discharge of foreign interest, by the full provision to be made for the whole foreign debt, and the equal punctuality I hope to see in the future payments on the domestic debts. I trust also, that all future loans will be founded on a previous establishment of adequate funds; and that a situation, like the present, will be thereby rendered impossible.

I cannot but regard the present case as so extraordinary, in many respects, that the ordinary maxims are not strictly applicable to it. The fluctuations of stock in Europe, so often referred to, have no comparison with those in the United States. The former never exceeded 50, 60, or 70 per cent: can it be said, that because a Government thought this evil insufficient to justify an interference, it would view in the same light a fluctuation amounting to seven or eight hundred per cent.?

I am of opinion, that were Great Britain, Holland, or any other country, to fund its debts precisely in the same situation as the American debt, some equitable interference of the Government would take place. The South Sea scheme, in which a change, amounting to one thousand per cent. happened in the value of stock, is well known to have produced an interference, and without any injury whatever to the subsequent credit of the nation. It is true, that in many respects, the case differed from that of the United States; but in other respects, there is a degree of similitude, which warrants the conjecture. It may be objected, that such a provision as I propose will exceed the public ability: I do not think the public unable to discharge honorably all its engagements, or that it will be unwilling, if the appropriations shall be satisfactory. I regret, as much as any member, the unavoidable weight and duration of the burdens to be imposed; having never been a proselyte to the doctrine, that public debts are public benefits. I consider them, on the contrary, as evils which ought to be removed as fast as honor and justice will permit, and shall heartily join in the means necessary for that purpose. I conclude with declaring, as my opinion, that if any case were to happen among individuals, bearing an analogy to that of the public, a Court of Equity would interpose for its redress; or that if a tribunal existed on earth, by which nations could be compelled to do right, the United States would be compelled to do something not dissimilar in its principles to what I have contended for.

Mr. LIVERMORE wished the amendment he had formerly mentioned might be made to the original proposition; it was to insert, before the word "interest," the words, "at a certain rate of."

Mr. SHERMAN apprehended it would strongly imply that Congress meant to reduce the rate of interest, and he did not wish that question involved with the present.

Mr. LIVERMORE's motion being seconded, the question was put thereon, and it being lost,

Mr. MANISON moved to amend the original proposition, so as to read as follows:

Resolved, That adequate funds ought to be provided for paying the interest and principal of the domestic debt, as the same shall be liquidated; and that in such liquidation, the present holders of public securities, which have been alienated, shall be settled with according to the highest market rate of such securities; and that the balance of the sums due from the public, be paid in such proportion to the original holder of such securities.

Mr. BOURDINOT said, he had long been in the habit of paying great respect to the sentiments of the gentleman from Virginia; but he feared, on this occasion, he had not viewed the subject with his usual accuracy. He was not surprised that the gentleman was led away by the dictates of his heart, for he believed he really felt for the misfortunes of his fellow-citizens, who had been the prey of avaricious men. Indeed, it is matter of less surprise, on another account, for heretofore I contemplated the subject in nearly the same point of view. Influenced by a desire to do justice to every person connected with the public, I wished for the means of compensating the original holders, who had sold their certificates at a great loss; but I found the thing, upon long and careful examination, to be both unjust and impracticable.

The honorable gentleman tells us, that the debt was contracted for meritorious services, and inquires whether the creditor received an adequate compensation in full discharge? I say, sir, this debt is still due, and that the person to whom it is due, has received nothing but a certificate as evidence of his claim; but then, if any of our first creditors have put another person in their shoes, the question will arise, are we to disown the act of the party himself? Are we to say, we will not be bound by your transfer, we will not treat with your representative, but insist upon a resettlement with you alone? But the same reasoning will oblige us to go further, and investigate all the claims of those who have received of the Government Continental money, which they afterwards parted with for ten, forty, or one hundred for one.

But, putting all this out of the question, and supposing the motion to be founded on principles of justice, I would ask how it is to be carried into execution? The nature of the public debt will demonstrate its impracticability. A great part of this debt was contracted by the clerks in office, who, when the Continental money was stopped, were supplied with some millions of dollars in loan-office certificates; they were given out in their names, and afterwards distributed among the farmers, mechanics, and others, who had furnished supplies, or performed services. Now, how is it possible that you can ever trace a certificate, under these circumstances, up to the man who was the original bona fide creditor? Not from the name on the face of the paper, because it is the name of the clerk in office, the mere agent of the public. Other certificates were taken out of the loan-office, by persons who were not concerned in making the loan; many neighbors sent money by one hand, who went and took out certificates in his own name, which he afterwards returned to the real lender. I have been entrusted myself with numerous commissions of this kind, when I have been going to the capital, where the loan-office was kept. Now suppose, as has been the case, that I took $10,000 from ten of my neighbors, each $1000, and that I placed the whole in the Continental loan-office at Philadelphia, taking out therefor ten loan-office certificates of $1000 each, which, on my return, I gave to those who had sent their money by me; all these certificates had my name in them, and here I should appear to be the original holder of $10,000 without any right whatever, and the men who deserve much of their country, for the aid they furnished her in the hour of distress, are stripped in a moment of the greatest part of their property. I believe, if we adopt this motion, we shall give room for such scenes of enormity as humanity will be shocked at the bare prospect of. I am, therefore, clearly of opinion, that if the principle be ever so just, we ought to reject it on account of its impracticability.

On motion, the committee rose, and reported progress, after which the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 12.

SLAVE TRADE

The following memorial of the Pennsylvania Society for promoting the Abolition of Slavery, the relief of free negroes unlawfully held in bondage, and the improvement of the condition of the African race, was presented and read:

The memorial respectfully sheweth,

That from a regard for the happiness of mankind, an association was formed several years since in this State, by a number of her citizens, of various religious denominations, for promoting the abolition of slavery, and for the relief of those unlawfully held in bondage. A just and acute conception of the true principles of liberty, as it spread through the land, produced accessions to their numbers, many friends to their cause, and a Legislative co-operation with their views, which, by the blessing of Divine Providence, have been successfully directed to the relieving from bondage a large number of their fellow creatures of the African race. They have also the satisfaction to observe, that in consequence of that spirit of philanthropy and genuine liberty which is generally diffusing its beneficial influence, similar institutions are forming at home and abroad.

That mankind are all formed by the same Almighty Being, alike objects of his care, and equally designed for the enjoyment of happiness, the Christian religion teaches us to believe, and the political creed of Americans fully coincides with the position. Your memorialists, particularly engaged in attending to the distresses arising from slavery, believe it their indispensable duty to present this subject to your notice. They have observed, with real satisfaction, that many important and salutary powers are vested in you for "promoting the welfare and securing the blessings of liberty to the people of the United States;" and as they conceive that these blessings ought rightfully to be administered, without distinction of color, to all descriptions of people, so they indulge themselves in the pleasing expectation, that nothing which can be done for the relief of the unhappy objects of their care will be either omitted or delayed.

From a persuasion that equal liberty was originally the portion, and is still the birth-right of all men; and influenced by the strong ties of humanity, and the principles of their institution, your memorialists conceive themselves bound to use all justifiable endeavors to loosen the bands of slavery, and promote a general enjoyment of the blessings of freedom. Under these impressions, they earnestly entreat your serious attention to the subject of slavery; that you will be pleased to countenance the restoration of liberty to those unhappy men, who alone, in this land of freedom, are degraded into perpetual bondage, and who, amidst the general joy of surrounding freemen, are groaning in servile subjection; that you will devise means for removing this inconsistency from the character of the American people; that you will promote mercy and justice towards this distressed race, and that you will step to the very verge of the power vested in you for discouraging every species of traffic in the persons of our fellow-men.

BENJ. FRANKLIN, President.
PHILADELPHIA, February 3, 1790.

Mr. HARTLEY then called up the memorial presented yesterday, from the annual meeting of Friends at Philadelphia, for a second reading; whereupon, the same was read a second time, and moved to be committed.

Mr. TUCKER was sorry the petition had a second reading, as he conceived it contained an unconstitutional request, and from that consideration he wished it thrown aside. He feared the commitment of it would be a very alarming circumstance to the Southern States; for if the object was to engage Congress in an unconstitutional measure, it would be considered as an interference with their rights, the people would become very uneasy under the Government, and lament that they ever put additional powers into their hands. He was surprised to see another memorial on the same subject, and that signed by a man who ought to have known the Constitution better. He thought it a mischievous attempt, as it respected the persons in whose favor it was intended. It would buoy them up with hopes, without a foundation, and as they could not reason on the subject, as more enlightened men would, they might be led to do what they would be punished for, and the owners of them, in their own defence, would be compelled to exercise over them a severity they were not accustomed to.

Do these men expect a general emancipation of slaves by law? This would never be submitted to by the Southern States without a civil war. Do they mean to purchase their freedom? He believed their money would fall short of the price. But how is it they are more concerned in this business than others? Are they the only persons who possess religion and morality? If the people are not so exemplary, certainly they will admit the clergy are. Why, then, do we not find them uniting in a body, praying us to adopt measures for the promotion of religion and piety, or any moral object? They know it would be an improper interference; and to say the best of this memorial, it is an act of imprudence, which he hoped would receive no countenance from the House.

Mr. SENEY denied that there was any thing unconstitutional in the memorial; at least, if there was, it had escaped his attention, and he should be obliged to the gentleman to point it out. Its only object was, that Congress should exercise their Constitutional authority to abate the horrors of slavery, as far as they could; indeed, he considered that all altercation on the subject of commitment was at an end, as the House had impliedly determined yesterday that it should be committed.

Mr. BURKE saw the disposition of the House, and he feared it would be referred to a committee, and he feared all their opposition; but he must insist that it prayed for an unconstitutional measure. Did it not desire Congress to interfere and abolish the slave trade, while the Constitution expressly stipulates that Congress shall exercise no such power? He was certain the commitment would sound an alarm, and blow the trumpet of sedition in the Southern States. He was sorry to see the petitioners paid more attention to than the Constitution; however, he would do his duty, and oppose the business totally; and if it was referred to a committee, as mentioned yesterday, consisting of a member from each State, and he was appointed, he would decline serving.

Mr. SCOTT.—I cannot entertain a doubt but the memorial is strictly agreeable to the Constitution. It respects a part of the duty particularly assigned to us by that instrument, and I hope we may be inclined to take it into consideration. We can, at present, lay our hands upon a small duty of ten dollars; I would take this, and if it is all that we can do, we must be content; but I am sorry that the framers of the Constitution did not go further, and enable us to interdict the traffic entirely; for I look upon the slave trade to be one of the most abominable things on earth; and if there was neither God nor devil, I should oppose it upon the principles of humanity, and the law of nature.

I cannot, for my part, conceive how any person can be said to acquire a property in another: is it by virtue of conquest? What are the rights of conquest? Some have dared to advance this monstrous principle, that the conqueror is absolute master of his conquest; that he may dispose of it as his property, and treat it as he pleases. But enough of those who reduce men to the state of transferable goods, or use them like beasts of burden, who deliver them up as property or patrimony to others. Let us argue on principles countenanced by reason and becoming humanity: the petitioners view the subject in a religious light, but I do not stand in need of religious motives to induce me to reprobate the traffic in human flesh; other considerations weigh with me to support the commitment of the memorial, and to support every Constitutional measure likely to bring about its total abolition. Perhaps, in our Legislative capacity, we can go no further than to impose a duty of ten dollars, but I do not know how far I might go, if I was one of the Judges of the United States, and those people were to come before me and claim their emancipation; but I am sure I would go as far as I could.

Mr. JACKSON differed with the gentleman last up, and supposed the master had a qualified property in his slave. He said the contrary doctrine would go to the destruction of every species of personal service. The gentleman said he did not stand in need of religion to induce him to reprobate slavery, but if he is guided by that evidence upon which the Christian system is founded, he will find that religion is not against it. He will see, from Genesis to Revelations, the current setting strong that way. There never was a Government on the face of the earth but what permitted slavery. The purest sons of freedom in the Grecian Republics, the citizens of Athens and Lacedæmon, all held slaves. On this principle the nations of Europe are associated; it is the basis of the feudal system. But suppose all this to have been wrong, let me ask the gentleman if it is good policy to bring forward a business at this moment likely to light up the flame of civil discord; for the people of the Southern States will resist one tyranny as soon as another. The other parts of the Continent may bear them down by force of arms, but they will never suffer themselves to be divested of their property without a struggle. The gentleman says, if he was a Federal Judge, he does not know to what length he would go in emancipating these people; but I believe his judgment would be of short duration in Georgia, perhaps even the existence of such a Judge might be in danger.

Mr. SHERMAN could see no difficulty in committing the memorial; because it was probable the committee would understand their business, and perhaps they might bring in such a report as would be satisfactory to gentlemen on both sides of the House.

Mr. BALDWIN was sorry the subject had ever been brought before Congress, because it was of a delicate nature as it respected some of the States. Gentlemen who had been present at the formation of this Constitution could not avoid the recollection of the pain and difficulty which the subject caused in that body. The members from the Southern States were so tender upon this point, that they had well nigh broken up without coming to any determination; however, from the extreme degree of preserving the Union, and obtaining an efficient Government, they were induced mutually to concede, and the Constitution jealously guarded what they agreed to. If gentlemen look over the footsteps of that body, they will find the greatest degree of caution used to imprint them, so as not to be easily eradicated; but the moment we go to jostle on that ground, I fear we shall feel it tremble under our feet. Congress have no power to interfere with the importation of slaves beyond what is given in the ninth section of the first article of the Constitution; every thing else is interdicted to them in the strongest terms. If we examine the Constitution, we shall find the expressions relative to this subject cautiously expressed, and more punctili-ously guarded than any other part, "The migration or importation of such persons shall not be prohibited by Congress." But lest this should not have secured the object sufficiently, it is declared, in the same section, "That no capitation or direct tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census; this was intended to prevent Congress from laying any special tax upon negro slaves, as they might, in this way, so burden the possessors of them as to induce a general emancipation. If we go on to the fifth article, we shall find the first and fifth clauses of the ninth section of the first article restrained from being altered before the year 1808.

Gentlemen have said, that this petition does not pray for an abolition of the slave trade. I think, sir, it prays for nothing else, and therefore we have no more to do with it than if it prayed us to establish an order of nobility, or a national religion.

Mr. SILVESTER said, that he had always been in the habit of respecting the Society called Quakers; he respected them for their exertions in the cause of humanity; but he thought the present was not a time to enter into a consideration of the subject, especially as he conceived it to be a business within the province of the State Legislatures.

Mr. LAWRENCE observed, that the subject would undoubtedly come under the consideration of the House; and he thought, as it was now before them, that the present time was as proper as any; he was therefore for committing the memorial, and when the prayer of it had been properly examined, they could see how far Congress may, Constitutionally, interfere; as they knew the limits of their power on this, as well as every other occasion, there was no just apprehension to be entertained that they would go beyond it.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, insisted that it was not in the power of the House to grant the prayer of the petition, which went to the total abolishment of the slave trade, and it was therefore unnecessary to commit it. He observed, that in the Southern States, difficulties had arisen on adopting the Constitution, inasmuch as it was apprehended that Congress might take measures under it for abolishing the slave trade.

Perhaps the petitioners, when they applied to this House, did not think their object unconstitutional, but now they are told that it is they will be satisfied with the answer, and press it no further. If their object had been for Congress to lay a duty of ten dollars per head on the importation of slaves, they would have said so, but that does not appear to have been the case. The commitment of the petition, on that ground, cannot be contended. If they will not be content with that, shall it be committed to investigate facts? The petition speaks of none. For what purpose, then, shall it be committed? If gentlemen can assign no good reason for the measure, they will not support it, when they are told that it will create jealousies and alarm in the Southern States; for I can assure them that there is no point on which they are more jealous and suspicious than on a business with which they think the Government has nothing to do.

When we entered into this confederacy, we did it from political, not from moral motives, and I do not think my constituents want to learn morals from the petitioners; I do not believe they want improvement in their moral system; if they do, they can get it at home.

The gentleman from Georgia has justly stated the jealousy of the Southern States. On entering into this Government, they apprehended that the other States, not knowing the necessity the citizens of the Southern States were under to hold this species of property, would, from motives of humanity and benevolence, be led to vote for a general emancipation; and had they not seen that the Constitution provided against the effect of such a disposition. I may be bold to say they never would have adopted it. And, notwithstanding all the calmness with which some gentlemen have viewed the subject, they will find that this discussion alone will create great alarm. We have been told, that if this would be the case we ought to have avoided it, by saying nothing; but it was not for that purpose that we were sent here. We look upon this measure as an attack upon the paladium of the property of our country; it is therefore our duty to oppose it by every means in our power. Gentlemen should consider, that when we entered into a political connexion with the other States, that this property was there; it was acquired under a former Government, conformably to the laws and Constitution, therefore any thing that will tend to deprive them of that property must be an ex post facto, law, and, as such, is forbidden by our political compact.

I said the States would never have entered into the Confederation, unless their property had been guaranteed to them, for such is the state of agriculture in that country, that without slaves it must be abandoned. Why will these people, then, make use of arguments to induce the slave to turn his hand against his master? We labor under difficulties enough from the ravages of the late war. A gentleman can hardly come from that country with a servant or two, either to this place or Philadelphia, but there are persons trying to seduce his servants to leave him; and when they have done this, the poor wretches are obliged to rob their master, in order to obtain a subsistence; all those, therefore, who are concerned in this seduction, are accessories to the robbery.

The reproach which they cast upon the owners of negro property, is charging them with the want of humanity. I believe the proprietors have as much humanity as persons in any part of the Continent, and are as conspicuous for their good morals as their neighbors. It was said yesterday, that the Quakers are a society known to the laws and the Constitution, but they are no more so than other religious societies, they stand exactly in the same situation; their memorial, therefore, relates to a matter in which they are no more interested than any other sect, and can only be considered as a piece of advice, which it is not customary to refer to a committee; but if it is supposed to pray for what they think a moral purpose, is that sufficient to induce us to commit it? What may appear a moral virtue in their eyes, may not be so in reality. I have heard of a sect of Shaking Quakers, who, I presume, suppose their tenets of a moral tendency. I am informed one of them forbids to intermarry, yet you may see them with a numerous offspring about them. Now, if these people were to petition Congress to pass a law prohibiting matrimony, would gentlemen agree to refer such a petition? I think if they would reject one of that nature, as improper, they ought also to reject this.

Mr. PAGE was in favor of the commitment. He hoped that the designs of the respectable memorialists would not be stopped at the threshold, in order to preclude a fair discussion of the prayer of the memorial. He observed, that gentlemen had founded their arguments upon a misrepresentation; for the object of the memorial is not declared to be the total abolition of the slave trade; but that Congress will consider whether it be not in reality within their power to exercise justice and mercy, which, if adhered to, they cannot doubt must produce the abolition of the slave trade. If, then, the prayer contained nothing unconstitutional, he trusted the meritorious effort of the petitioners would not be frustrated.

With respect to the alarm that was apprehended, he conjectured there was none; but there might be, just cause if the memorial was not taken into consideration. He placed himself in the case of a slave, and said, that, on hearing that Congress had refused to listen to the decent suggestions of a respectable part of the community, he should infer that the General Government (from which was expected great good would result to every class of citizens) had shut their ears against the voice of humanity, and he should despair of any alleviation of the miseries he and his posterity had in prospect; if any thing could induce him to rebel, it must be a stroke like this, impressing on his mind all the horrors of despair. But if he was told that application was made in his behalf, and that Congress was willing to hear what could be urged in favor of discouraging the practice of importing his fellow-wretches, he would trust in their justice and humanity, and wait the decision patiently. He presumed that these unfortunate people would reason in the same way, and he, therefore, conceived the most likely way to prevent danger was to commit the petition. He lived in a State which had the misfortune of having in her bosom a great number of slaves; he held many of them himself, and was as much interested in the business, as any gentleman in South Carolina and Georgia, yet, if he was determined to hold them in eternal bondage, he should feel no uneasiness or alarm on account of the present measure, because he should rely upon the virtue of Congress that they would not exercise any unconstitutional authority.

Mr. MADISON.—The debate has taken a serious turn, and it will be owing to this alone if an alarm is created; for, had the memorial been treated in the usual way, it would have been considered ed as a matter of course, and a report might have been made so as to have given general satisfaction. If there was the slightest tendency by the commitment to break in upon the Constitution, he would object to it; but he did not see upon what ground such an event was to be apprehended. The petition prayed, in general terms, for the interference of Congress, so far as they were constitutionally authorized; but even if its prayer was, in some degree unconstitutional, it might be committed, as was the case on Mr. Churchman's petition, one part of which was supposed to apply for an unconstitutional interference by the General Government. He admitted, that Congress is restricted by the Constitution from taking measures to abolish the slave trade; yet there are a variety of ways by which it could countenance the abolition, and regulations might be made in relation to the introduction of them into the new States to be formed out of the Western Territory. He thought the object well worthy of consideration.

Mr. GERRY thought the interference of Congress fully compatible with the Constitution, and could not help lamenting the miseries to which the natives of Africa were exposed by this inhuman commerce. He never contemplated the subject, without reflecting what his own feelings would be, in case himself, his children, or friends, were placed in the same deplorable circumstances. He then adverted to the flagrant acts of cruelty which are committed in carrying on that traffic; and asked, whether it can be supposed that Congress has no power to prevent such abuses? He then referred to the Constitution, and pointed out the restrictions laid on the General Government respecting the importation of slaves. It was not, he presumed, in the contemplation of any gentleman in this House to violate that part of the Constitution; but that we have a right to regulate this business, is as clear as that we have any rights whatever; nor has the contrary been shown by any person who has spoken on the occasion. Congress can, agreeably to the Constitution, lay a duty of ten dollars on imported slaves; they may do this immediately. He made a calculation of the value of the slaves in the Southern States, and supposed they may be worth ten millions of dollars. Congress have a right, if they see proper, to make a proposal to the Southern States to purchase the whole of them, and their resources in the Western Territory might furnish them with the means. He did not intend to suggest a measure of this kind; he only instanced these particulars to show that Congress certainly has a right to intermeddle in the business. He thought that no objection had been offered of any force to prevent the commitment of the memorial.

Mr. BOURNIVOR had carefully examined the petition and found nothing like what was complained of by gentlemen contained in it; he, therefore, hoped they would withdraw their opposition and suffer it to be committed.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said, that, as the petitioners had particularly prayed Congress to take measures for the annihilation of the slave trade; and as that was admitted, on all hands, to be beyond their power, and as the petitioners would not be gratified by a tax of ten dollars per head, which was all that was within their power, there was, of consequence, no occasion for committing it.

The question on the commitment being about to be put, the yeas and nays were called for, and were as follow:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Benson, Boudinot, Brown, Cadwalader, Clymer, Fitzsimons, Floyd, Foster, Gale, Gerry, Gilman, Goodhue, Griffin, Groat, Hartley, Heathorn, Heister, Huntington, Lawrence, Lee, Leonard, Livermore, Madison, Moore, Muhlenberg, Page, Parker, Partridge, Rensselaer, Schureman, Scott, Sedgwick, Seney, Sherman, Sinnickson, Smith, of Maryland, Sturges, Thatcher, Trumbull, Wadsworth, White, and Wynkoop—43.

NAYS—Messrs. Baldwin, Burke, Coles, Hunger, Jackson, Matthews, Sylvester, Smith, of South Carolina, Stone, and Tucker—14.

The memorials were referred accordingly.

MONDAY, February 15.

PUBLIC CREDIT.

The House went again into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. BALDWIN in the Chair.

Mr. MADISON's motion for a discrimination being under consideration.

Mr. SEDGWICK.—The proposition, Mr. Chairman, contains a question of the utmost importance. And the committee must be obliged to the gentleman who brought it forward for his very ingenious discussion of the subject of the domestic debt. With respect to the question now before the committee, so much has been said, that I think it will not be necessary to consume much of their time in the investigation. On the subject of contracts I have to observe, that whenever a voluntary engagement is made for a valuable consideration for property advanced or services rendered, and the terms of the contract are understood, if no fraud or imposition is practised, the party engaging is bound to the performance, according to the literal meaning of the words in which it is expressed. Such contract, whether of a Government or an individual, may be either transferable or not transferable. The latter species of contract receives an additional value from its capacity of being transferred, if the circumstances of the possessor should render the sale of it necessary or convenient to him. To render the transferable quality of such evidences of contract in any degree advantageous to the possessor, it is necessary to consider, in case of sale, the alienee possessed of all the property of the original holder; and indeed it is highly absurd, and even contradictory, to say, that such evidences of debt are transferable, and at the same time to say that there is in them a kind of property that the holder could not convey by bona fide contract.

This is the construction which has invariably been given to these contracts, whether formed by Government or by individuals. To deprive the citizen of the power of binding himself by his own voluntary contract, or to prevent a disposition of property in its nature alienable, would be a violent and unjustifiable invasion of one of those rights of which man, as a citizen, is the most tenacious, and would indeed break one of the strongest bonds by which society is holden together.

In the transfers which have been made, the contracts were fairly made; the whole rights have been transferred. It is not pretended any fraud or imposition has been practised. The risk was calculated by the parties, and it was observed, that the risk contemplated a revolution in the Government.

From the foregoing deduction of particulars, it is presumed to be proved that a property is vested in the transferees. That if this property is divested by the Government, the law for that purpose would have a retrospective operation, and that no ex post facto law could be more alarming than that by which the right of private property is violently invaded.

Having considered the nature of the contract, and of the obligations which result from it, I beg leave to call the attention of the committee to those circumstances by which that obligation may be destroyed, impaired, or suspended. They are stated to be, 1. Performance. 2. Voluntary discharge. 3. Composition. 4. Inability.

And gentlemen are called upon to give information of any other causes which can produce either of those effects.

With regard, more particularly, to the proposition before the committee, I have to observe, that with regard to these contracts, there has existed a depreciation in consequence of the failure of Government regularly to pay the interest. That in this depreciated state, the securities have been alienated; that of course the original holders have sustained a loss; that if the loss resulted from the fault, and not the misfortune of Government, the creditors have, undeniably, a demand against the Government for compensation; that this demand, however well founded, can never authorize the Government to invade the honestly acquired property of the present possessors, a property warranted by the terms of the contract itself, and sanctioned by the act of Congress, of April, 1783, and the validity of it recognised by the Constitution we have sworn to support.

With regard to the claims of the original holders, it is, however, observable, that the domestic creditor, at the time the contract was formed, well knew the nature of the Constitution of the Government administered by Congress, the other contracting party; that its power of performance depended on the ability and good-will of the States; that Congress had always performed its duty, had made the necessary requisitions; that this was its utmost power; and that the failure had arisen wholly from the neglect of the States. I therefore submit it to the committee, whether, if the original holder has a just or equitable demand, he should not resort to the State of which he is a member?

I admit that the case of an original holder is indeed a hard one; that I have a respect for his misfortunes and for his pretensions; that if satisfaction is discovered to be just and practicable, I would not hesitate to go to the utmost ability of the Government for that purpose. But let me ask, what merit will the Government possess, if we strip one class of citizens, who have acquired property by the known and established rules of law, under the specious pretence of doing justice to another class of citizens?

It was implicitly agreed, that eighty per cent. depreciation would not authorize the interference proposed by the motion. I ask, then, for some point of depreciation to be pointed out, which will authorize such interference.

The question for which I contend has received the universal approbation of mankind, there are no instances of the interference contended for, and this general sense of mankind affords me some evidence of truth.

This contract was founded on a valuable consideration. It was the price of our liberty and independence. The possessor claimed, according to the very terms of the contract, though it is not pretended that the engagements of Government have been performed. No composition with the creditors is proposed; nor is the proposition founded on any pretended inability of the Government; for to comply with the intention of it, 1,600,000 dollars, annually, more than is proposed by the report of the Secretary would be required.

By reason of the circumstances which have taken place, the honorable gentleman (Mr. Madison) supposes, that if the whole amount of security shall be paid to the present possessor he will have a sum of money to which the original holder is equitably entitled. If this is true, then no interposition is necessary, it being a well-known rule of law, that an action will always lie to recover money out of the hands of another, to which the plaintiff, from the principles of equity and good conscience, is entitled.

With regard to the effects which will probably result from this measure, I have to observe, that they will be destructive to our national character. That the world is now willing, charitably, to impute our former miscarriages to events we could not control; but should our first measures, in regard to public faith, be a violent infraction of our contracts, it will sanction all our bitterest enemies have said to our disadvantage. With regard to its effects on credit, little dependence will be placed on the plighted faith of a Government which, under the pretence of doing equity, has exercised a power of dispensing with its contracts, and has thereby formed for itself a precedent of future violations, both with respect to its funds and contracts. With regard to discovering who was the original holder, except so far as respects the army debt, I am certain there are no documents by which the necessary facts can be discovered.

I presume it as a fact, with regard to much the greater part of the debt, that any fictitious name was inserted. And with regard to the army debt, the soldiers, generally, who were in the service at the conclusion of the war, had received ample satisfaction for their services, at the time of their enlistment, having been paid more, on an average, than two hundred and fifty dollars per man.

I have only to add, that the proposed system will lay a foundation for infinite frauds and perjuries, and that it will, beyond all powers of calculation, multiply the evils of speculation.

Mr. LAWRENCE observed, that the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Madison) derived force from the talents and knowledge of that gentleman in public transactions; but that, on examination, it would be found to contain doctrines very repugnant to the interest and prosperity of the Union.

He then stated that the debts contracted by the United States were for loans of money, supplies of articles necessary for the public wants, and for actual services rendered in different employments. That these debts were ultimately adjusted and reduced to their present transferable form. That every part of the contract was essential to it. The negotiability was a material part. That the nature of the contract was frequently recognised by the late Government. That, in 1783, Congress recommended certain funds to be established to pay the interest, and put the principal in a course of discharge. That this recommendation was unequivocal, as to the nature of it, and made no discrimination between the possessor and original holder. That the subsequent conduct of that body was conformable to this recommendation. That they had annually called on the States to furnish money to pay the interest, without discriminating between the original holder and present possessor. That they had paid interest on the securities, without making any discrimination. That provision had been made for holders of loan-office certificates that were subject to liquidation, to have them cancelled, and others issued for the specie value. That the holders of certificates were enabled to have them registered, to guard against accidents; and that no distinction was made between the original holder, and the alienee. That the transferable nature of the claim was for the benefit of the creditor, because it gave it an active value. That he consented to take it, and consulted his own advantage. That the conduct of the late Congress, since the war, had been uniform in the support of this contract, and they had done no act to impair its obligation, according to the terms of it. That this contract was valid against the Government; for, notwithstanding the truth of the gentleman's observations, that the nation is the same, though the bodies that administered the Government were different, there was yet far greater security; and to remove all doubt, a clause that made all debts and engagements valid against the United States, under the late General Government, valid against the present, was inserted in the Constitution.

He further observed, that this contract having descended upon the Government, there was no right in the Legislature to impair the force of it. That the particular Governments are restrained from passing laws impairing the obligations of contracts. That this interference would be a violation of the contract, between individuals, when the certificate was transferred; and it would not be presumed, the States being prohibited, that the General Government had the power to do it.

He then adverted to the principles of the gentleman, to wrest the obligation of the public to the original holder; and observed that the same principles were in favor of the present possessor. That public justice required a performance of contracts, when there was no fraud on the part of the holder. That the possessor had been guilty of no fraud, no deception. That the contract between him and the original holder was fair, and that a hazard and risk attended the purchase adequate to the advantage. That nothing short of a revolution in Government could have produced payment. That if there was an imposition, the public occasioned it; and between the original holder and the public, there might be a claim for retribution. That public faith was as sacredly pledged to the bearer, or present possessor, as to the original creditor. That public credit results from fair and upright conduct; that the Government, to support it, must perform its contract. That this was a contract recognised by them, and as such should be discharged. That the condition we have been in made it proper for us to be cautious on this subject; and even at present, people doubted our disposition to establish our credit. That this would give a fatal blow to it, and when we should recover, if ever, was doubtful. That the public opinion was difficult to be ascertained; gentlemen had different modes to determine it. He supposed it was better ascertained by the acts of public bodies, than by squibs in the newspapers, or by pamphlets written by individuals. That the uniform conduct of men, deputed by the particular States to represent them, in the late General Government, was the best standard; and their opinion, from the year 1783, was in favor of the present possessor. That the conduct of the particular States was another circumstance; that he did not know of any discrimination made by them, though it had been attempted. That the general opinion of men of property was in favor of it; and that these sources of public opinion were more certain than those he had before mentioned.

He further observed, that although he believed gentlemen supposed no advantage would be derived to the United States from this discrimination, yet much would arise. That part of the army was composed of foreigners, many had left the country, others were dead; all their part would be unclaimed. That certificates were issued to public officers to a great amount, and were paid by them to persons from whom they purchased. The difficulty of making proof of the original creditor would be great; and, from this circumstance, great sums would be gained to the public. That there were persons enough who would have sagacity to discern this; and they would doubt the purity of the public motive; should the gentleman's plan be adopted.

He then adverted to the circumstance of the new creditor receiving paper. That this paper might be subject to another liquidation on the same principle as the present. That it would introduce doubt and distrust of public engagements; and there would be no greater security, although a fund was pledged, than there is at present, for whenever the public pleased, they might destroy the obligation. Arguments were improperly addressed to their feelings; but that, however hard it may be for the original creditor, who had parted with his certificates to contribute to pay the debt, yet it would be equally hard on him who had been injured by the Continental money, who had been plundered by the enemy, who had had his property burned by them in the course of the war; and that instances of these kinds were numerous.

He then adverted to the doctrine of the Court of Equity; and urged that this Court must be governed by principle. That were the Committee this high Court, and the United States the original creditor, and the present possessor before them, and if there appeared no fraud on the part of the possessor, the original creditor would have no just claim on him. That between the United States and original creditors, the United States were in fault, and the claim, if good, would be against them.

He also noticed the resolution of Congress of the 10th of April, 1780, relative to the depreciation of the pay to the army; and declared, that this was limited to persons then in service. Those who had left it, even the day before, had not this justice done them. But that this case was between the United States and the persons rendering them service. The act did not affect third persons; it did not take from one and give to another, as the present measure proposed, and was therefore dissimilar.

He further observed, that his objection to the amendment was on the ground of the contract; yet he would mention some instances to show the impracticability of the scheme. In many cases a State had sold lands for a low price in these certificates. That by the law of this State, creditors residing within the British lines during the war, had received, by law, these certificates, at their nominal value, from their debtors. That British and domestic creditors had received from their debtors large sums at their nominal value. That foreigners were possessed of large sums of the registered debts, in their names, for alienated certificates. That these, and many other instances which might be mentioned, would show the difficulty of devising a scheme, with the checks and exceptions that would be proper, to render it in any manner feasible. It had been objected to the Secretary's report, that it proposed a reduction of interest. He observed, that there was a material difference in a plan that made the consent of the creditor necessary, and one that reduced his capital without his consent. That this part was not now under consideration; but that the scheme of the gentleman from Virginia would add a considerable sum to the provision proposed by the Secretary, from the increased interest to be provided for, and the additional number of officers to be appointed to carry his plan into execution. He concluded with saying that he was still open to conviction; but that he was, at the time of speaking, against the gentleman's propositions.

Mr. Smith, of South Carolina, remarked, that it was necessary and proper the House should give the subject the most ample discussion. The question had long agitated the public mind, and the people should know that it had occupied the serious attention of their Representatives, and be made acquainted with the principles of their decision. For his part, having bestowed on it the most attentive consideration, he could assert, that the more he contemplated it, the more he was impressed with a conviction that the proposition was unjust, impolitic, and impracticable. It consisted of two parts: The one was to take away the property of one person; the other was to give that property to another; and this by a voluntary interposition of the House, by a mere act of power, without the assent of the former, or without even the application of the latter. For it was remarkable, that the original holders, who had alienated their certificates, had not come forward with this demand; and it is presumable, that, had they applied for redress, they would reject any indemnification which was the result of such manifest injustice. To prove that this was taking away the property of a citizen by force, he observed, that the purchaser had, by a fair purchase, acquired a right to the full amount of the sum expressed in the certificate, which it was not within the power of the House to divest him of. No tribunal on earth could lawfully deprive a man of his property fairly obtained. The purchaser bought under the act of Congress, making the securities transferable; and having given the market price, without fraud or imposition, he was, by virtue of such purchase, vested with the complete and absolute ownership of the certificate, as fully as the original holder; and had as much right to demand full payment as the original holder would have had, had the security been still in his hands. Even should the House refuse, by an act of power, to pay him more than half his demand, the other half would still remain against the public; it could not be extinguished. The debt would continually haunt them; the creditors would loudly clamor for justice, and sooner or later the balance would be paid. Then would they incur all the odium of a violation of private rights, without deriving to the public any advantage whatever. He considered the measure as doing a certain evil, that a possible good might result from it. This was not, in his opinion, the proper mode of doing good. Justice cannot be founded on injustice; and to take money out of the pocket of one man, to put it into that of another, is a precedent which may justify future interferences. This step would lead the House to others: for, if the principle be a just one, then the Government should look into all the transactions and speculations of individuals, in order to correct them, and make retribution to every individual according to his losses. He was persuaded, that the true policy of a Legislative body was, to pursue the broad road of justice, clearly marked out before them; for it was an undeniable truth, that whenever they deviated into by-roads and trackless paths, without any other guide than their own imagination, they would get bewildered in a labyrinth of difficulties, and rejoice to trace back their steps, and regain the plain road. Now, the plain line of conduct is, to do strict justice, such as is enforced in judicial tribunals, between man and man, in a similar case. The debtor is bound to pay the debt to the holder of the security; the contract, between the giver of the bond and the person to whom it was given, is done away the moment the latter assigns it to another person. If A gives a bond to B, who parts with it to C, there is no longer any obligation on the part of A to pay B, but he must pay it to C. A has nothing to do with the private negotiations between B and C, nor to inquire what consideration was given for the security. All that he has to inquire is, whether he really signed it, and had value received for it, and the amount of it. He cannot say to the holder, you gave but fifty dollars for this security of one hundred dollars, and I will pay you only fifty; for the law will compel him to pay the hundred. This is a point of justice between man and man. Is there another point of law and justice for the Government? By what rule is the Government to square its conduct, if not by those sacred rules which form the basis of civil society, and are the safeguard of private property?

These observations fully refute the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, that the original holders still have a claim on the Government, notwithstanding they have transferred their securities, and that in cases of individuals bearing an analogy to the present, a Court of Equity would interpose and give redress. The direct contrary is the fact; there never was an instance of a Court of Equity assuming such power. In cases of bankruptcy, which are under the superintendence of Courts of Chancery, the debts of the bankrupt are paid in equal proportions to all the creditors, whether original holders or assignees, and the court never inquires into the terms of the alienation. It cannot be said that the original holder had any claim of justice on the Government; his claim must be addressed to our humanity; but the House have no authority to gratify their humane inclinations at the expense of justice, and by a sacrifice of private rights. If the project is unjust in itself, the application of the property to relieve the distresses of the original holder cannot change its nature—it must still be unjust—the mode of appropriation cannot alter the rectitude or turpitude of the measure. If, therefore, Congress have a right to take away the property of the present holder, they may apply the savings to public purposes; and what appearance would such a scheme have to the world? Would it not forever ruin our national character?

The gentleman from Virginia has said, that justice and good faith are the substratum of public credit; but he was persuaded, that the justice and good faith held out by this plan, would be a substratum of sand, a foundation too weak to support our public credit, which will soon crumble to pieces. If the object of the gentleman be to afford relief to the distressed, without impairing legal rights, let inquiry be made into the cases of those original holders, who sold from absolute distress; let those cases be selected and brought forward, and he would yield to no member in his alacrity to give them every adequate compensation, and to indemnify them for their sufferings; but he could not assent to a proposition which blended together the cases of all the original holders, and gave them the property of others. That there were various classes of original holders; some had sold for purposes of speculation or trade, and had probably made good bargains; and were now in a better condition, than if they had still retained their securities. Others got rid of their securities, because they had no confidence in the Government; these the public were not bound to indemnify; the plan would place them on a better footing than those who, having confidence in the General Government, had, notwithstanding their distresses, kept their securities; for, supposing the former sold eight years ago, for four shillings in the pound it was not improbable that they had by this time doubled their money; and yet, in addition to that, they were to get ten shillings, which would give them eighteen shillings; whereas the latter would only be able to sell their securities at the market for fifteen or sixteen shillings, after they were funded. Some present holders have received their securities by way of legacy—are these to have one-half taken off? Is their paternal estate to be torn from them? Had their parents been still living, they would receive twenty shillings in the pound, but the circumstance of death is to strip the children of one-half.

The gentleman from Virginia has said, that giving the present holders, by alienation, the highest market price, would be doing them ample justice; but did the public mean to refund them the money they had actually advanced? No; they were to receive this ample justice by a bit of paper, nominally for ten shillings; but which this very measure would instantly depreciate to eight, or six shillings. They would have this consolation, that, according to the gentleman's reasoning, they would still have a claim against the Government for the balance. For, if the original holder, by selling his certificate for four shillings, has now a just claim against the Government for the balance of sixteen shillings, which it is asserted he should now acknowledge a debt of ten shillings, which he would sell for only six, would hereafter have a just demand against the public for four shillings. The reasoning might be carried further, for it would follow, that whenever the public shall pay in paper which shall depreciate, the seller will have a demand against the Government for the difference.

From the distance of time at which these securities were issued, it may be reasonably supposed that many of the original holders are now dead. The average life of man is estimated at seven years, according to the most accurate calculation on insurance of lives. Some of them are dispersed in foreign countries, or settled in the Western Territory; and it would be right, before the House took such a step as this, to understand clearly, to what amount these alienations have been made; at present, they are uninformed on the subject, and have no documents before them. If these alienations are inconsiderable, this project would be dangerous, even admitting its justice. History affords no precedent for the measure. The gentleman from Virginia, whose industry is equal to his ability, would have produced some similar case, had any existed. The South Sea scheme is totally inapplicable. There the directors of the company having been guilty of the most enormous frauds and villainous practices, the Government confiscated their estates, and bestowed them on the company which they had been the means of ruining, instead of promoting their interests, which they had been appointed the guardians. Were the purchasers of securities chargeable with any crimes for which they merited confiscation? Were they appointed by law the guardians of the property of the original holders?

Nor was the other instance, respecting the depreciation of pay made good to the officers during the war, more in point; for there the public paid them with the public money, and not with that of individuals.

The Constitution itself, he said, was opposed to the measure, for it was an ex post facto law, which was prohibited in express terms. The transfer of public securities was lawful at the time these alienations were made; an attempt to enforce, to punish the transferees is an attempt to make an ex post facto law, by making that now unlawful which was lawful at the time it was done. It alters the nature of the transaction, and annexes the idea of guilt to that, which, at the moment of commission, was not only perfectly innocent, but was explicitly authorized and encouraged by a public act of Congress. By that act, those who had money were invited to purchase of those who held securities, and now we are called upon to punish the purchasers who bought under that invitation. The Constitution restrains the States from passing any laws impairing the force of contracts; a fortiori is the Legislature of the Union restrained. What an example to hold up to the Judiciary of the United States! How could they annul a State law, when the State would be able to plead a precedent on the part of Congress? The right of property is a sacred right; no tribunal on earth can deprive a citizen of his property, unless for a fair equivalent, for the public welfare. The purchaser is vested, by the sale, with an absolute right, to the full amount of the security, and it is beyond their authority to divest him of it. They might, indeed, by an act of power, declare that he should be paid only half; but his right to the other moiety would not be extinguished. It had been said, that the original holder still had a claim against the public, because he had received only two shillings and six pence for services worth twenty shillings. On the same principle, and with more justice, the present holder would still have a claim for ten shillings, because he has the public bond for twenty shillings. No ingenuity can overcome these stubborn principles of law and justice; they are immutable, and must ultimately prevail. The House had been told that if the Government had defrauded the original holders out of their dues, it was fit the public should rectify the fraud. The former Government was not deficient in inclination to do them ample justice; but, from the imbecility of the Confederation, had not the means. In those days of democratic enthusiasm, the people were afraid of an energetic Government; having so recently experienced the severity of the former one, the citizens of these States were cautious in trusting any Government with power; and it is not improbable that some of the original holders, who suffered their embarrassments, from the want of a Government competent to the payment of its debts, would themselves have opposed vesting Congress with powers adequate to this object. Even the present Constitution, which is a mild one, met with considerable opposition; had it been rejected, the public securities would have never been paid.

Public opinion had been mentioned as favoring the plan. Nothing was so difficult to attain as a knowledge of public opinion; but, as far as he had been able to collect the public opinion, it was against the measure.

Publications in newspapers appeared, indeed, on both sides, but the greatest number against it. The Legislature of this State has strongly expressed its sentiments by rejecting, almost unanimously, a similar project; and in society he had met with but few advocates for it.

Though it had been admitted that no instance of a similar nature had ever existed in other countries, yet it is asserted that this was because the depreciation of public securities in Europe bore no comparison with those in the United States. The securities in England had fallen to seventy per cent. without occasioning an interposition of the Government; and there was no occasion to assert that a greater depreciation would have induced an interference. If the measure was unjust in the one case, it was equally so in the other; the increased rate of depreciation could not justify it; for where would it cease to be unjust, and begin to be just? What is the precise point of depreciation at which the Government could be warranted in stepping in, and depriving the holders of their rights? Right and wrong cannot depend on the argument of depreciation; they are fixed principles, which cannot fluctuate.

The hardship of requiring those who have lost four-fifths of their due, to contribute to the payment of taxes, has been noticed. When they sold their certificates, they thought that the person to whom they sold them would one day or other receive something for them; and they knew that he could receive nothing, unless the debts were funded, and that in such case they would be compelled to contribute their proportion of taxes. If they, on the other hand, were impressed with the idea that the purchaser would never be paid, then the bargain was not a fair one on their part, for they took the purchaser's money, and gave him what, in their belief, was not an equivalent.

The impolicy of the measure is evident, because it will check the negotiability of public securities, will enhance the terms of future loans, and injure the public credit. Public debts were said, by some, to be public benefits; doubtful as this doctrine may be, it is acknowledged universally, that without a negotiable quality, instead of being of any utility, they would be a most grievous burden to the community. Who would purchase, when he had before his eyes the terror of a discrimination? A future occasion may arise, when, from the experience of war or other emergency, a similar attack might well be apprehended. Purchasers, therefore, will be rare, and the risk they run will restrain them from giving the full value of the public securities. This will operate, then, as a considerable injury to the original holders, who never alienated their certificates, and who ought not to be involved in the pernicious consequences of this measure. With respect to impracticability, it was not the strongest objection with him; because, if he were persuaded that it was both just and politic, he would go every length in endeavoring to accomplish it; but, even on this head, difficulties innumerable appeared. Some which are unanswerable have been mentioned, and it has been clearly shown that it is absolutely impossible to trace the original holders. He had chosen to combat the measure on its principle, because he thought it was not a just one, and the establishment of it might lead hereafter to future interferences and unhappy consequences.

It was the wisest policy of Government to adhere strictly to their plighted faith, when it was in their power to do so, even should such strict adherence work an injury to some part of the community. This was the practice with nations in the case of a treaty, which, when made by competent authority, they considered themselves bound to observe, although they deemed it disadvantageous to them, lest a refusal should deter other nations from treating with them in future. It is by this line of conduct that public credit can alone be supported. Whatever may be the merits of the alienors, or the speculations of the alienees of public securities, it is not the business of Government to interpose; these are contracts, they must be paid as far as the public resources will extend. The claim of those unfortunate creditors, whose distresses drove them to the necessity of sacrificing their certificates, form a claim on the humanity of Congress; and he should not be opposed to giving them relief, provided the funds were taken out of the public Treasury, and not in the manner proposed. In whatever light he viewed the project under consideration, he felt a strong conviction that it was such a one as ought to be rejected.

Mr. Ames agreed with the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Madison) in regard to the validity of the debt. There was propriety in saying the nation is the same, though the Government be changed. The debt is the price of our liberties and cannot be, diminished a farthing, the gentleman from Virginia says; and why? Because the Government, as one of the contracting parties, cannot annul, or vary the bargain, without the consent of the other. If the measure proposed by that gentleman corresponds with that sound principle, he should have the pleasure of agreeing with him on the ultimate decision; but if the measure should be found on a fair discussion, to be subversive of that principle, it would not merit the countenance of the committee.

A claim upon our justice is made, on behalf of the original holders of securities, who have transferred them. Does the plighted faith of the country stand charged to pay the difference between the price their securities sold for in the market and their nominal sum? In order to make the affirmative appear, the worthy gentleman has said, that the paper is the only evidence of a prior contract; and while the paper was sold, the subsidiary right to the debt still remained in the seller. Supposing this novel doctrine to be true, which cannot be conceded, it will not warrant any conclusion in prejudice of any purchaser of the Loan-office debt; for the paper was given when the loan was made: as no prior debt existed, the paper is the very debt. The gentleman ought, therefore, to confine his motion to the army debt, as his principle seems inapplicable to any other. And even on liquidating the army debt, the certificate extinguished the prior debt; otherwise the public would be twice charged. As when one man owes another an account, and gives his bond for the balance, the account is no longer of force. By the terms of the certificate, the person transferring has lost his claim against the public. He has freely transferred; for if violence or fraud were practised, the law will afford him redress. In society, as well as in a state of nature, property is changed by the consent of the last occupant. He may dispose of it by gift or at half-price, and give a complete title. Nor will the pretence that this transfer was free only in appearance, avail; for the motives which disposed the owner to sell cannot affect the right of the purchaser. Every such creditor risked something; either that the Government would not pay him at all, or not in due season. The risk, computed in free and open market, will be nearly right. It is a kind of insurance against these risks, and the insurers and insured will calculate the rate of insurance better than Government can do it. If there is a new risk of Government interposing, it seems that the purchaser, who may be called the insurer, did not rate his risk high enough. It seems pretty clear, therefore, that there is no claim on the stipulated justice of the country.

Another sort of justice is set up; a different sort from that which we were taught in the schools and churches; it is called abstract justice, and it is said to demand allowance for the loss sustained by the failure of public payments. No man respects more than I do the merit of the army; but the soldiers, at least, had something towards justice by their bounty.

Stock has sold in England at fifty per cent. discount, and yet no retribution has been made. Where then does this new line of justice begin? It can scarcely be denied, that their claim, if they have any, is not a debt. The arguments alleged by the gentleman are addressed merely to the compassion and generosity of the Government. Nor do I know that there is any ground for saying, that public opinion is in their favor. It will be allowed, that if justice is to be done, it should be impartial justice. Partiality would be more cruel than total neglect. Will you refuse to make amends for paper money? For property taken by our army in Canada? For losses sustained during the war? For towns burned? In this last case, it is to be observed, that Government has promised protection; and inability to protect is as much a debt as the case in question. The intermediate holders, who bought at six shillings and eight pence, and, despairing of Government, sold at two shillings and six pence, have an equal claim. Are all these to be excluded? Let us not break contracts for half justice. The example of paper money is adduced to show that the public made up losses; but this is an example of the public fulfilling its contracts, not annulling them. Paper money is a bad source to draw examples from.

But is it true that justice requires the public to pay for all the losses sustained in times of calamity? I think not; for by fraud the Government would be obliged to pay for more than was lost. The resources of the sufferers will more easily repair such losses than the Government can make them good; and besides, in extreme cases, it would extend and prolong the evil. If an army should invade England, and the city of London should be burned, and the country laid waste by the order of the King, all Europe could not pay for it. What is justice? A line of public conduct which necessarily tends to utility. No pretence of abstract justice can be valid, if it tends to evil rather than good.

But if there subsists a claim on the public justice, it cannot impair the debt, in the hands of the present holder, for which the public faith is pledged. It is alleged that the seller, who sold for a trifle, will be taxed to pay the purchaser. He certainly ought to fare as other citizens do. But taxes are in proportion to property. If he has property, then the plea of necessity is destroyed; if he has none, then his taxes will be a mere trifle. The project is not justice, even to those whom it pretends to relieve. If you allow less to the purchasers than they gave, it is downright robbery; if you allow them more, it is half-way justice to those who have sold. I would not risk everything to do justice, as it is called, and then not do it.

But this fragment of justice cannot be given to some, without wronging others; you impair the property in the hands of the present original holders. It is not supposed that the alienated property is nearly equal to that which is still in the hands of the first holders. Be that as it may, I believe, with confidence, that it would be cheaper for the present holders to pay the market price of the paper proposed to be given to the former holder, than to suffer the shock which this measure would give to the credit of their paper. I will not enter now into the merits of the Secretary's plan; but I think it not difficult to show that he proposes better justice to the present original holders than is contained in the motion, and that the debt, funded on this plan, would sell for more in the market. Great sums have been lent to the public by trustees, who acted for others, and only lent their names. Many original creditors were not first holders; supplies were furnished to contractors for the army, who got credit, and afterwards paid in paper, as they received it of the public. Many towns hired soldiers for a gross sum, and agreed to take the wages. Private debts have been paid at par. A man in embarrassed circumstances, instead of compounding with his creditors for ten or a dozen years' forbearance, paid them at par, or near it, in public money, which, in that period, was supposed to be as likely to be paid as his private note. No less a sum than two hundred and fourteen thousand dollars were paid in this way to one mercantile house, at about fifteen shillings in the pound. Compare the gross injustice of these cases with the pretended justice of the motion; consider what it pretends to pay the purchaser. But Loan-office certificates have sold from fifteen and eighteen shillings in the pound to five shillings. Foreign purchasers gave more than our market price. Before they bought, they got certificates of the nature of the debt, that it was not liable to any deduction, and that the transfer would be valid. People in the first offices in this country, and abroad, signed them. Five hundred thousand dollars were bought for one Dutch house, and registered, and the partners in the sum have divided the certificates by giving their own bonds. What will be the effect? Justice or injustice? In these cases, the gentleman will admit, that the rights of these people are perfect. The debt, he says himself, cannot be diminished a farthing; property is sacred; the right to a single dollar cannot be violated. Let the gentleman then acknowledge that he must give up his project or his principles.

I have endeavored to show what sort of abstract justice this is. But if it should be allowed that there is a claim of justice, what then? Let them claim justice of those who have done them injustice, not of the fair purchaser.

Let us examine the claims of the purchasers. The gentleman's argument on this point merits attention; if it is right, for its novelty in Congress; if wrong, for its tendency. Here I think it necessary to apologise, not for my sentiments, their apology must spring from their propriety, but for the manner in which I express them. My zealous of other gentlemen, whom I respect as I ought. I know that men of the best intentions entertain a favorable opinion of a discrimination. There is a wish to do more than justice to the one, and the heart, betrayed by its sympathy, consents to injustice to the other. But, sir, I cannot claim the merit of moderation on this point. I will not pretend that I doubted first, and then decided. The principles of my education, and the habits of my life, predispose me to believe, and my short experience and reading have confirmed it, that nations cannot admit cunning into their councils without its shedding a malignant influence on their affairs. Experience teaches Government, as well as men, that nothing is safe that is wrong. We have endured tender-laws, and the pitiful expedients of a trickish policy. Our experience has cost us dear. The old Congress, however, were guided by other maxims; with little power, and scarcely retaining the mock representation of it during the whole year, they prosecuted the objects of an honest policy with a zeal which repulses and despair could not extinguish. They could say, with Francis the First, after the battle of Pavia, "We have lost all, except our honor." They resolved against discrimination, and foreigners, as well as citizens, bought securities under the public faith. But when the Constitution was framed, adopting the debts as valid, restraining ex post facto laws, and laws impairing contracts, who entertained any suspicion? The speech of the President, and the resolutions of the House in favor of public credit, banished it. Does this look as if public opinion was hostile to these purchasers? If it really is, it is more a duty on Government to protect right when it may happen to be unpopular; that is what Government is framed to do. If, instead of protecting, it assumes the right of controlling property, and disposing of it at its own pleasure, and against the consent of the owner, there is a cheat in the compact.

It will be admitted, that there is a right vested in the purchaser; Government cannot diminish it a farthing, says the gentleman; but he says we cannot pay both. Then abide by your word of honor; prefer perfect rights, by solemn compact, to claims on your compassion. The claims of the present holders, you say, are just; are the others more than just? Treat all just claims alike, and do not rob on the highway to exercise charity. Why make one creditor pay another? He says, Government is to get nothing by this; and yet he says, we owe these people, and our creditors shall pay them. Is paying a debt in this way not getting money? He talks of rival claims; there is no rivalry; the sellers agreed that there should be none. If Government is bankrupt, compound with your creditors. Will this act of violence console the sufferers? Will they enjoy, as a favor, the violation of the rights for which they fought? The South Sea and Mississippi schemes have been adduced as examples. In the former, Government interposed to fulfil the contract. The Mississippi is not parallel. What the gentleman calls public justice, I am sure he would not practise in his own case.

I have chosen to consider the principle of the motion; but it cannot be carried into execution. We have seen that justice, in the abstract, will not be done, nor can the measure proposed be effected. We may very well suppose that innumerable difficulties will arise in practice which cannot be foreseen. The detail will be endless; an account must be opened for each claimant; public offices must be opened, officers multiplied, and great expense incurred; there is no clew, by the records, to the cases of money deposited by agents for other people. I have inquired, and am told that it is not possible. Will you admit oral evidence, and of persons interested? Will you fill the land with discontent, corruption, suits, and perjury? The new paper, if not transferable, will be no great relief; if transferable, there will be a new harvest of speculation; the after-crop will be more abundant than the first cuttings. A purchaser keeps his note for twenty shillings, by law you make it a note for ten shillings. How many frauds will be practised on the unwary? If the mind balances on these points, let policy turn the scale.

Will not this measure shake Government? Instead of doing as it has promised, Government is to do as it pleases. Right is to depend, not on compact, and sacred faith, and the Constitution; but on opinion, on a major vote, where nothing, not even right, is fixed, will not the Government be liable to perpetual commotion?

How will it affect our national character? How will it affect public credit? We shall have to pay for meddling, if we in future should have any credit. The famous Coloel Chartres said, he would give one hundred thousand pounds for a character—not for its own sake, but because he could get two hundred thousand by it—Henry VIII. borrowed money on his personal security; and his base Parliament voted, that as he had done great things for the realm and church, he should be discharged from those obligations. Charles II. shut up the Exchequer. What was the consequence? King William paid fourteen per cent. on annuities, and at the rate of ten and twelve per cent. interest; but by good faith, in five or six years money fell to five per cent. interest. By breach of faith, we vote the Government into a state of pillage, and deprive it of its powers.

I have thus endeavored to show, that there is not a debt subsisting against the public, in favor of the original holders, who have sold out; that the motion is chargeable with partiality, and is inadequate to its pretended object; that it will do injustice to many, and violate the sacred rights of property; that the purchasers are secured by the contract, by the faith of Government, and by the Constitution; that the measure is not practicable, and will produce confusion, corruption, and expense; and that it will weaken, disturb, and disgrace the Government, and impair its credit.

I have made this recapitulation of my argument, in order to bring it into one view—if it is just, or only plausible, let us ask, what will be the effect? Is this what was expected under the new Constitution? Did we expect it? Is there one here who has not told the people, that an end would be put to tender acts and paper money, and the ruinous effect of Government's interposing in contracts? Who, in or out of Congress, did not suppose that the letter and spirit of the Consitution said as much? The spirit of the times said more. Will not the people charge us with violating the Constitution and the rights of property? If we plead necessity, they will demand, how came it that we were ignorant of it? And, if it exists, what is there that breach of faith can save that good faith would lose? Or, what will that be worth, which may be secured by a measure that will tarnish our national honor, and transmit to our children an inheritance of reproach? Is there no refuge but in dishonor? We have borne adversity before, and we had rather submit to the worst events of an honest policy—and this project is not to relieve any burdens; for Government is to rob, not for plunder, but to get the reputation of justice.

If our own citizens say this, what will foreigners say? They will not be restrained, either by the opinion of their fellow-countrymen, or by attachment to our prosperity. They will detail their losses, and the arts by which their confidence was gained—they will think that we have been taught a species of immoral philosophy—that we administer Government by a kind of cunning logic, which confounds right and wrong—they will rejoice that the Mahattas and Americans are at a distance; the ocean has not hitherto proved a barrier against our depredations. An American abroad will be obliged to deny his country.

However, I still believe that justice is a law to Congress; but if justice, and public faith, and honor, have ceased to be things, let them cease to be names—let them be blotted from the vocabulary of our nation. If they have no being, why should they be made use of to conjure up church-yard terrors, to haunt the hypochondriac imagination?

I will not be so uncandid as to charge the worthy gentleman with such intentions. I think so highly of his probity and patriotism, that if he can be made to see that these consequences will follow, or only be apprehended, he will give up his scheme. But if Government has this right, what right of private property is safe? In the East, Government is said to be the sole owner of property, and may resume it at pleasure. This absurd doctrine will not find advocates, for it would not do for practice, even where it may not be denied to be true; human nature revolts against it; it would shock the morality of Botany Bay; it would exasperate, beyond sufferance, the patient slavery of Indostan—and who can give a good reason why one sort of property should be more sacred than another?

If we pursue another kind of policy, such as the preamble to the Constitution declares to be the objects of the Government, this Government, and this country, may expect a more than Roman fortune. The Government may have more credit, the people more knowledge, and the blessings of peace a longer duration than the world has ever experienced. That gentleman helped to frame the Constitution. I have no doubt it is the better for his eminent abilities; I hope that the love of his own work, and his zeal for the cause which he has so ably supported, will induce him to abandon a measure which tends so fatally to disappoint the first wishes of his own heart, and the hopes of his country.

The committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, February 16.

PUBLIC CREDIT.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. BALDWIN in the Chair. Mr. MADISON's proposition still under consideration.

Mr. JACKSON observed, that although as young a politician as any on the floor, and convinced that the weight of experience was against him on so important a national subject, he could not be silent; particularly as he had the honor of seconding the gentleman's motion (Mr. MADISON) now before the House, that it would be therefore expected that he should bring forward his reasons, and the principle which actuated him to it. He confessed, that had he not before leaned to the side of a discrimination, the arguments of that able gentleman would have induced him to support the plan he had brought forward. He was induced on another motive to rise, to show that the numerous arguments of the gentlemen in opposition, yesterday, had not convinced him of the impracticability or injustice of the proposition.

The House were told much of the moral obligations we were under of paying our debts, and the impolicy and injustice of interfering with private contracts. The obligation, he believed, was no where denied; the debt was of the highest nature; it was the price of our independence: the only difficulty is, how that debt shall be discharged. He would here observe, that the justice of the plan before the House had not been so fully objected to, as the impracticability, although it had been asserted to be unjust by some of the gentlemen who had spoken.

He would consider the justice of the proposition. The House had been told the nature of those contracts, and the valuable considerations of them. The contract, as it struck him, fell under the legal terms of do, ut des; I give that thou mayest give; or, I give that I may receive. In all contracts there are three requisites: 1st, The agreement. 2d, The consideration. 3d, The thing to be done or omitted. This consideration is to be an equivalent, or full recompense for the thing to be performed. Let us examine what is the thing to be done, and what the consideration is. The creditor who was to perform the third article of the contract, held twenty shillings, which was to be given for a valuable consideration. What was this consideration? Two shillings and six-pence. He argued, that if this twenty shillings was worth no more than two shillings and six-pence, the contract was fair and substantial; but, if gentlemen carried the idea further, and declared these twenty shillings was money of equal value with the two shillings and six-pence given, he contended that the contract was destroyed. Equity would relieve, would declare it an unrighteous bargain, that there was not an adequate compensation, and would set aside the contract.

But a gentleman (Mr. LAWRENCE) had told us, that equity has fixed rules, and that none of those rules would apply. He agreed with them, that it was as necessary for a Court of Equity to be confined by rules as a Court of Law; but exclusive of the former case, he had mentioned there were two others, under which the present case came—misfortune and oversight. He would quote the authority of Blackstone, did he not expect he should, as in former instances, be complained of by that gentleman for it. Here, he said, had been one of the greatest misfortunes; a calamity attending a whole community, a Government unable to pay its debts. Here was likewise an oversight equal to it. Was it possible for the poor soldier, uninformed, to foresee, when he sold his certificates, that they would rise to the present value? Or that he could anticipate the present day, and a second revolution? Equity, then, requires some mode of justice, and the tribunal exists somewhere. I believe, with my friend from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SCOTT,) that we are the tribunal; for equity must exist somewhere, or the Government is at end. The Courts of Law, and common Courts of Equity, have no power to interfere; they cannot compel us to their mode of funding our debts. The injury cries aloud for redress; iniquity is in the land, and we are bound, by every principle of justice, to step forward, and do what justice we can.

But perfect justice cannot be done, say gentlemen, and therefore we should not attempt the business at all. The consequences of this doctrine are fatal; they tend to a deprivation of all Courts of Justice; for there is no instance which can be adduced, where, what is termed justice, is reconciled to the opinions of all, and where some objection cannot be raised.

But there is no Government on earth, say gentlemen, which ever interfered with assignable contracts. This doctrine has been both countenanced and denied by the gentlemen in the opposition, in their relation of the South Sea scheme. One gentleman told us that it did not apply, because the Government was not concerned, and that it was in consequence of their agents' villainous practices only. Another acknowledged the Government was concerned, and bid us take warning from it. He contended, that the case was in point; that if there was any difference, it was in its exceeding the bounds of the present. The Government of England was necessary; the Parliament of England received £7,000,000 for the privilege of permitting the Company to take in the public debts, and allowed them to fund many millions on a footing not subject to their private debts. Yet, after all this countenance, the omnipotence of Parliament assumed the supreme powers of Equity, compelled compensations, discharged debtors, and punished those who had done no more than comply with the letter of the law.

The doctrine was not then novel. In 1712, Parliament interfered between the Royal African Company and its creditors; not when the Company was in a state of bankruptcy, but for years before. The different nations of the world, besides—notwithstanding what gentlemen have advanced with respect to the Constitution, and the impairing of contracts—and the States here had followed it, had passed statutes of limitation to actions, although it was not implied in contracts. The House had a right likewise to guard against frauds.

Public justice, he observed, had not been done; the soldiers, the original creditors, had not been paid; they had not received the equivalent; they had received but two shillings and six pence, and there was twenty shillings due them. That many of those creditors, and the war-worn soldiers, were pining in retirement, in the midst of cruel situations, and condemning the injustice of that country, whose Congress, in consequence of their exertions, is legislating here this day.

If, then, public justice (which he contended the plan promoted) should be done, public credit would follow; for justice is reason, and credit is a natural consequence of reason; and whether the interest, as gentlemen had told the House, was paid in paper or not, he did not conceive that the plan would in the least effect it. It had not injured Britain in the example before the House.

Public faith, the House was informed, made no distinction; the public faith, he observed, was pledged to the soldiery and to citizens who furnished supplies. It never had been fulfilled; two shillings and six pence was not the twenty shillings they were entitled to. This principle was even settled at home, by that very Congress some gentlemen so much honor. The soldiers were paid with depreciated money during the war, when Congress liquidated their accounts.

A gentleman (Mr. Smith) had observed, that this plan places those who have alienated in a better situation than the present original holder, by adding the ten shillings to what he formerly received. He contended, that the present original creditor would not be injured, nor would they grumble at seeing justice done, their more distressed brethren; those who had parted with them had done it, in most instances, from necessity; those who hold at present, are the more wealthy.

The same gentleman had observed, that had the market price risen to twenty shillings, that this plan could not have been adopted. He allowed the difficulty which would arise, but contended, that, in that case, the public faith would not have been discharged; but the case is the reverse, the House knew the market price, and had it within their compass to do justice. But, said the gentleman, the soldier might have kept it to the present moment, and then it would have been worth twenty shillings. Unfortunately, foolish soldier, indeed! he observed, why didst thou not steel thy feelings against the wife of thy bosom, and behold thy beloved children, without a murmur or an exertion, starving on a dunghill? Then thou mightest have kept thy nominal twenty shillings until it became a real pound. But, added he, is this the language of mercy, or of justice? What will a man not give in exchange for his life? And, if he has feelings, for that of his wife and children?

But public opinion is vague, say gentlemen, and the House has been cautioned against pamphlets and newspapers, as if the plan had been composed from thence. The abilities of the honorable gentleman will give a serious refutation to this charge. As for his own part, he had the candor to assure the gentleman, that he had taken hints, and that he always would take hints, whilst in public life, from any valuable information given in either. Like the berry on the brier, if he could pluck it with safety, he would; and, if a valuable hint was encircled with a torrent of abuse, he would accept the hint, whilst he would despise its attendant.

Sir, said he, public opinion divided us from Britain; public opinion induced us to change the former for the present Constitution; public opinion brought us here to legislate; and public opinion can replace us in our former situations; and how ever public opinion might be censured by some gentlemen, he trusted she would never need an advocate on this floor.

This public opinion is in favor of the original creditor; it is impossible to be otherwise. The people of America are a grateful people, and they cannot, with indifference, view the earnings of those who established their independence, converted into the coffers of the wealthy and ambitious. The speculator, he contended, was already more than satisfied, if it was only on the principle of interest which had accrued for six, seven, and eight years past, and which they had speculated on since.

He then observed, that, conceiving those objections raised by the opposition refuted, the next consideration was the impracticability.

The gentleman, who had brought the plan forward, was more capable of answering the numerous obstacles thrown in by the phalanx of orators yesterday than himself; but he would undertake to answer a few of them which he had noted.

A gentleman had declared it impracticable; because the quartermasters of the late army, and the clerks of office, received the certificates in their own names; and, as an instance, quotes himself as having received large sums in that manner. But, said he, are not the books and documents remaining? Is there not evidence still existing of the original creditor? That gentleman's own objection proves it. We will call him as an evidence; and there is no doubt but mankind are not so debased, but that many other similar confessions will come forward. Besides, there could be a touchstone applied equal to what the highest Court of Equity used, and there is little fear but the truth would be found out, and a detection made of fraudulent claims. The impracticability, he observed, was out of the question, with respect to the speculator, who would receive the highest market price.

But the public accounts were many of them lost. Make it worth the time of the original creditor, and this would be in a great measure obviated.

Again, says a gentleman, (Mr. Snowdick,) the certificates are in fictitious names, and he knows an instance in Boston. Then that gentleman is likewise good evidence; and the claim, from his testimony, would be invalidated; but if not, the same equitable proof would be required.

He went on to observe, that here, Proteus like, the gentlemen change their reasoning, and declare the public would be gainers by the mode. He asserted, that it would not be the case by their own account. If, however, the claimant did not come forward, he would contend that the public, not the speculator, ought to be the gainer; that the public here, would possess the same right as an estate left without an heir.

But it had been advanced that the money would be again generally distributed among the poorer class of people, and that speculators would be flying to every part of the Union to reap second crops. He advanced that such distribution would be a public blessing, and that, by the measure, the tears of the afflicted would be dried up, and widowed hearts be made to sing for joy. The lesson, he believed, had been now taught, and would prevent the extremes of speculation in future. He seemed confident, that the second crop would not be so injurious to the community, or prove so plentiful a harvest to the speculator, as the first.

It was said to be necessary, and we should consequently have a host of officers. Now, he denied that necessity. There were numbers of officers in the Treasury Department who might attend to the business; and a small fee, which would be cheerfully paid, would find officers, if necessary, of responsibility and character in the different States.

But it is an ex post facto law. This he denied. No law had yet passed for funding the debt; we have a right to fund the debt as we please. Some gentlemen, opposed to the present principle, join the Secretary in opinion for lowering the interest. We have seen threats, under that idea, not to fund at all; and we cannot compel subscription without the holder's consent.

It is again said, that if Government do this now, they may take the same step hereafter; this, he would observe, was reasoning on surmise. It was not probable, if within the sphere of possibility, that America would ever have a debt in the same situation. Loans, if exigencies should arise, will be procured on adequate provisions; and foreigners, from viewing our justice, and the unanimous resolve respecting them, will place a value and dependence on us. If America is wise, said he, few wars will arise, situated as we are, in a remote country from the warlike nations of Europe. The wars we may expect will be with a few tribes of Indians; great loans will, therefore, not be required. But, supposing all the possible exigencies, the soldier is as necessary a requisite as the supply. Will he trust again your broken faith?

The gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Ames,) he observed, had charged the favors of the motion with raising church-yard terrors. With what propriety, he could not judge, unless that gentleman, like a man who passing through a church-yard saw an apparition, and had the impression so strongly in his mind, that he insisted on it that all his neighbors saw it also. The dangers that had been magnified were on the other side. We have been told of the fifteen shillings in the pound, paid by foreigners in Holland; and one gentleman (Mr. Geary) had denounced against us the terrors of the ultima ratio regum. Are we, said he, independent or not? If we are, we have a right to modify our own debt. What would Britain or Holland say, should we interfere with their funds? Would they not suppose us deprived of reason, or laugh at our imbecility to attempt it? Those who have purchased in our domestic funds are on the same footing with our own citizens. If we are not independent, it is high time to make ourselves so, whatever power might oppose us. The gentleman who brought forward the motion, had been charged with addressing the passions. This might be retaliated; for declamation had been used for argument on the other side.

Equity, said he, if the cause be equal, will suffer, in many instances, the heart to decide. The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Smith) has declared, that what he has seen written on the subject, has been as much on the one side as on the other; if so, the heart, in this instance, ought to govern; and gratitude and humanity, its noblest principles, are in favor of the original creditor.

He had been against the funding principle at this present moment; but, as the House had determined on it, it became his duty to acquiesce, but on principles of honor and justice. And it was to be remembered, that the landholder of America was the person ultimately to pay this debt, and his property would be mortgaged for it; for although commerce might immediately supply the revenue, the landholder was the consumer; he, therefore, hoped the debt would be funded on principles congenial with their wishes. That class of people, when they contemplated their independent situation, and their domestic happiness, although they would revolt at the idea of filling the pockets of the speculator, would cheerfully advance their proportion for the payment of the soldier and the citizen, whose exertions had procured them the blessings they enjoyed.

Mr. Benson.—The gentlemen in favor of this motion come forward as the advocates of the late army. I wish, therefore, to be ascertained of one fact, do the army wish a measure of this kind to take place? I apprehend that they do not; and I am led to this opinion from a knowledge of the habits of military men; they prefer their honor to every pecuniary consideration, and they generally are actuated by that principle alone. I will state a case. Suppose I purchased an officer's certificate for one hundred dollars, and I was to fund it; the Treasurer would say, you are to receive but fifty dollars, the other fifty are reserved for the original holder. Now, if I was to go and tell the officer, that, notwithstanding my purchase of all his right, title, and claim to the one hundred dollars, the Government would give me but fifty, retaining the other fifty for him. He would answer, I will never receive a farthing of it, because it is your money, fairly and honorably purchased of me. Now, in this case, what would you do? Should these fifty dollars fall to the Government, or to me? I reason in this manner, because I suppose this would be a general case. The Society of Cincinnati, of the State of New York have, by a resolution, which they have published in the papers, disavowed the principle; and, in Rhode Island, a member of the Society was expelled for taking advantage of the tender-law of that State, and paying off a bona fide debt with depreciated paper. I apprehend the principle of action still remains the same throughout the whole of the army. When the soldier conveyed his certificate, there was a contract between the parties, that whatever sum the Government could pay, the whole of it should go to the assignee. Now, by an act of violence, you take the half of it away, and enable the assignor to discharge the contract by paying fifty dollars, when he had engaged that the purchaser should receive one hundred. This is, in effect, the same as the payment of depreciated paper under a tender-law, and would be equally rejected by those whom it is intended to favor.

I would state the case, as if it had happened between the gentleman and myself, could he hesitate to say the whole sum was fairly mine, and surrender it up, notwithstanding the legal interference of the Government? This is a question I would not suffer myself to reason upon; I would not trust my mind with it, lest it should preponderate in favor of self-interest, though against the common principles of truth and justice. I cannot think the army would accept the interposition; we ought, therefore, to be cautious how we trifle with the honor of other people.

I do not pretend to say, that the persons intended to be relieved by the proposed scheme have not a claim against the United States; but I deny that it is a claim upon our equity or justice; it may be a claim upon our humanity; and, whether we will satisfy this claim, depends on circumstances which have no connexion with the present question.

Mr. JACKSON.—God forbid, Mr. Chairman, that I should trifle with the honor of men I value and esteem so highly; it would be the last thing I could think of. But, sir, as a Legislator, I cannot consent that the pittance which was the reward of distinguished services, shall be torn from them by the arts of insidious speculators; but there are others, who have a claim in equity upon our justice, who ought not to be sacrificed to the soldier's honor.

Mr. WHITE said, he agreed with the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. SEDGWICK) in the principle, that if a contract is made for a valuable consideration, and with the understanding of both parties, the Legislature ought not to interfere in it; and should it appear that the transaction between the original holders of certificates and the purchasers was a fair one, the dispute, in his mind, was at an end. But no gentleman had attempted to show that this was the case, though all the arguments against a discrimination were founded on that supposition. Perhaps it might be said, that every argument ought to be considered as fair; unless the contrary be proved. But where one man has obtained the property of another to the amount of £100 for £10, or £12 10s, the transaction must be explained to him, before he would believe it to be honest. What is the present case? The original holders, who have parted with the evidences of their debts, were principally common soldiers, militiamen, and farmers in indigent circumstances. Who were the purchasers? The Secretary of the Treasury tells us, that the most enlightened among our citizens are the creditors of the United States; common soldiers cannot be comprehended in this description. What must have passed, he asked, between the soldier, the militiaman, or farmer, and the purchaser? What reason could the purchaser assign for offering £10 for a paper which specified an obligation to pay £100? It must be something like this—the States will never pay you; if they do, it will be at a very remote period, so long as to be useless to you; but to relieve your present necessities, I will take the risk on myself, and give you £10. Now, could any enlightened man, he asked, in 1783, or at any subsequent period, in which time the transfers took place, believe that the independence of America was in danger, or that debts could not be provided for?

He knew so many instances of transactions like that which he had stated, that he doubted not the greater part of the certificates had been obtained by similar means. Indeed he could not conceive any other by which they could be obtained.

He said we were, perhaps, without a precedent in any other nation which would be strictly applicable; but he desired gentlemen to determine for themselves, whether, under such circumstances, the man who had rendered services to his country should be deprived of his reward, or whether the purchaser ought to receive it. He said it was very different in the common transactions of life. If a man purchased a tract of land for £1000, paid the money, and took a bond for the conveyance, a third person, by informing the purchaser that the seller could not make a title, or by other false suggestions should obtain a transfer of the bond in consideration of £100, and get a conveyance and possession of the land, yet, on repaying the £100, the conveyance would be set aside, and he would be restored to his land.

He gave some other instances of a similar nature, and said he believed, if a bond, whether due, or to become due, was assigned under such circumstances, that the obligee would be justifiable in contesting it in a Court of Law, and that the injured person would, on application, obtain redress. He said, that in cases of extreme hardship, Courts of Equity would give relief without express proof of fraud; that this was the law of Great Britain, and was agreeable to the principles of the civil law; that the Roman jurists, he believed, had fixed the point of extreme hardship to one-half of the value of the property transferred; in England the Court was to judge.

He said he did not think the present holders were strictly entitled to any thing more than the original purchasers; that here the maxim, quoted on the other side of the question, that the assignee stands in the shoes of the assignor, properly applied. You cannot place another on more advantageous ground than that on which you stand yourself. The plea of an innocent purchaser could not take place; the nature of the transaction must appear evident to every man concerned in the transfer.

He said the reverse of this did not hold. An assignee was not always in as advantageous a situation as the assignor; and instance the case of an executor who should obtain the assignment of his testator's bond at an undervalue; and who, he said, could not retain in his hands the amount of the sum specified in the bond, which the creditor might have recovered, but only the sum which he actually paid for the bond.

He said, that, though in his opinion, the present holders of certificates were strictly entitled to no more than what had been paid to the original holders, yet, as an investigation of that circumstance would be involved in inextricable difficulties, and since we were (as had been very properly observed, and well expressed by a gentleman from South Carolina,) settling the business of a family, he was willing to acquiesce in the motion of his colleague.

He said, that arbitrators often gave the injured party less than his due, for peace sake; and he was willing to act on the same principle. He doubted not but Courts of Justice would give relief in particular cases; but, in a matter of that magnitude, he thought the interference of the Legislature very proper. The South Sea business, he thought, in that respect, a good precedent. Two gentlemen had mentioned the business; he would not say they had misstated the transaction, but he thought their accounts imperfect. They said they had the documents under their hands; he wished they had been read; he had them not, but would state from memory what he thought applicable to the case in question. The directors of the South Sea Company, by various arts, induced the people to give as high as £1000 for £100 stock; in many instances the money was paid, in others it was contracted to be paid. A gentleman has said, that Parliament interfered, not to violate, but to perfect the contract; but what did Parliament do? They confiscated the estates of the directors, and applied the amount to the relief of those who had actually paid their money, and suspended suits against those who had not paid; and authorized the debtors to discharge their debts by the payment of ten per cent. on the real value of the stock subscribed for. But if he was wrong in supposing the present holders ought to stand in the place of the first purchasers, they could be considered, only as having purchased, in market, a paper of indefinite value; if, then, they get the highest market price, they are not injured. He would now endeavor to obviate some of the objections to the measure, on account of its impracticability; and in general terms observed, that much greater pains had been taken to show the impracticability than the injustice of it. He said, if it was just, we ought to adopt it; and he did not doubt but the wisdom of the Legislature would be able to carry it into effect. Purchasers, he said, had been represented as the supporters of public credit; but he could not consider them in that light. The offering a tenth or an eighth part of the value of the bond of an individual would tend rather to blast his credit than to support it; it would have the same effect with respect to the public.

He said he had lived long enough to be convinced that wise and great men, having the same object in view, often differ in opinion with respect to the means of accomplishing it; therefore, every proposition ought to be treated with candor and respect. He made that observation in consequence of what passed yesterday. A gentleman from Massachusetts had introduced his speech in a manner somewhat new—with an apology for an impropriety which he intended to commit. He pursued the arguments of those who went before him, in opposition to the amendment; but his speech consisted principally in an effusion of opprobrious epithets, some of which he repeated, and said, to detail the whole would perhaps fill half a column of a newspaper. He said he felt, on the occasion, not for himself, for he had not expressed his sentiments on the subject under debate, but for the honor of the House, in which, he thought, no such language ought to be used.

It had been said, we came forward as volunteers; that the original holders did not put in their claim. That might be easily accounted for; they were generally obscure and indigent; had too much modesty, or perhaps not the capacity to come forward. That he believed the crowd in the gallery did not consist of original holders. A gentleman from New York (Mr. BENSON) had objected to multifarious propositions. He was not certain that he understood the word; but he had never considered it as applicable to two. That the proposed amendment had brought the business to such a state, that we had the choice of two systems. In order to determine which to adopt, it is necessary to examine the merits of both. That proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury he considered as exceptionable; that the proposed reduction of interest would be a breach of public faith; for although it was to be effected by the consent of the creditors, it would operate as coercion with respect to the original holders. He doubted not but the purchasers would eagerly embrace the proposal of four per cent. on the nominal sum. The original holders would not; they would wait for a more favorable determination; if they ever should consent, it would be with reluctance, and because they find they shall get nothing in any other way. The proposed disposition of the surplus revenue among the non-subscribers can have no effect; if Government do not choose to pay more than four per cent. interest, they will levy taxes only to that amount. The inducement to the acceptance of his several propositions, in consideration of the reduction of the interest are all futile. Western lands to the amount of one-third! It is well known Western lands are not a property in much estimation among the holders of certificates.

With regard to his other proposition of annuities and remote payments, it may be observed that the proposed reduction is not founded on the inability of the States to pay, but on the principle of expediency only, lest taxation should be extended to a degree, and to objects which it might not, at this time, be proper to attempt. Now, what security have we that the same principles of expediency will not operate ten years hence?

He observed, that the purchase of annuities had not been practised in America, and he did not think it would become an object as it was in Europe. That in Europe there were many single men who carried their views no further than their own lives, and who, as they advanced in years, became fearful of difficulty and distress in old age; but this seldom happened in America; there were few without families, and the case of procuring subsistence removed all apprehensions of suffering in old age. Besides, a man in most parts of the country could realize his money in such a manner as to double it in value in fifteen years. With regard to public opinion, he would say nothing, as he had no documents to prove what he might advance. He might, however, conjecture, from the operation of the several systems.

If the amendment should be adopted, the taxes would be increased, but, at the same time, rendered more easy, as the means of payment would be in so many more hands. The people would see their indigent neighbors relieved, and those who had rendered services to their country in some degree rewarded.

But if the plan proposed by the Secretary should be adopted, the present holders of certificates, men without public merit, however respectable they may be in their private characters, will be raised to an enviable state of wealth; the people, he presumed, will very ill brook the payment of taxes, when they see them applied to such purposes. Besides, we are told, that five million dollars have been purchased in Holland; the interest of which will perhaps equal the whole expenses of our Civil Government. Will the people approve of such a tribute, unless we can convince them of the justice of it? If it is just, if we have received value for it, no doubt but we must submit to the burden, however great it may be.

Mr. HARTLEY.—I do not wish to trespass upon the time of the committee, but I cannot consent to give a silent vote on this occasion. I mean, however, to confine myself to a few observations, as many of my ideas have been communicated by other gentlemen. The honorable gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. SMITH) has anticipated much of what I had to urge; I shall, therefore, reduce my view of the subject to two points; first, as to the justice or legality of the measure, in obliging a creditor, or assignee, to take less than a certificate expresses, and pay the difference to another; second, as to the practicability or policy of the motion and its consequences.

As to making further satisfaction to the officers and soldiers of the late army, who have sold their certificates for an inconsiderable sum, and who have in consequence reaped a less reward than the Government contracted for, and intended them, I conceive it has nothing to do with the present question. However, if there is a disposition in Congress to make a further compensation to those brave and meritorious men, I would be among the first to support the measure; but I think this a subject too momentous to be involved collaterally in the question now under consideration.

With respect to the first point that offers itself, I have to remark, that a man, who enters into a contract, should know the consideration, and understand the principles upon which it is made, and these should be expressed on the face of the evidence of the contract. Now, if this contract be of a negotiable nature, the person to whom it is discovered the agreementum, and is naturally led to consider the circumstances of the debtor, his ability and integrity. Suppose even the evidence of the contract to be obtained by fraud, unless it be against the express provision of a statute, and is transferred to a third person for a valuable consideration, without notice of fraud, it must be paid. A fraud in any link of the chain is corrected by a bona fide transfer for a valuable consideration, without the knowledge of that circumstance by the purchaser.

Now, let us apply these principles to the present case. Here is an instrument of writings, specifying a debt to be due from the United States to the original holder, or bearer; this being brought into market, is offered to a third person, he, before his purchase, sees that the contract was executed in consequence of a consideration, and not against any positive statute; he then inquires the ability of the Union, and its disposition to comply with the contract; and, from a consideration of these circumstances, he concludes, with respect to his own interest and safety in the purchase, and pays what is conceived to be the value. What is there to discharge the Government from the payment? Is it pretended that the services and supplies were an inadequate compensation? If it even was so supposed, it would not authorize us to refuse a compliance with our engagements; any interference would set afloat the great principle upon which the public tranquillity and happiness depend. This leads me to consider the subject in my second point of view, with respect to its policy and practicability, and the consequences that would result from the attempt.

There are but few original holders who have transferred that can be found; of consequence,

[FEBRUARY, 1790.]

Public

you would throw the major part of the debt into an intricate labyrinth. The present possessor would be shifting back the certificate to the original holder, as far as a latitude is given. Many persons who were bare trustees would be reaping advantages, and drawing money from the public treasury, to which they are not entitled; oaths would be multiplied on oaths; perjuries on perjuries; fraud upon fraud; and every species of speculation would ensue; deception would be a strong trait in the character of the times, and the whole of the United States would be in motion, each endeavoring to prey upon the other. The consequences of a second inundation of this nature are to be dreaded, and ought to be carefully avoided.

The quantity of one kind of certificates or the other will not be known; hence no special appropriation can be made. The most enlightened mind will not be able to penetrate through the difficulties, confusion, and uncertainty which will inevitably result; consequently, the event will be a dangerous speculation. Whereas, on the other hand, if your debt is ascertained and fixed, you can make regular and specific appropriations; even men of moderate capacity may know the value of your securities. Stamping them with this precision, they will acquire a steadiness in value; they will no longer fluctuate or dissolve in the hands of their holders, like snow before the rays of the sun.

This stable value, thus given to your debt, will convert a public evil into a partial good; it will partake, in some degree, of the nature of specie, and circulate in aid of that medium of commerce and exchange, bringing with it many of the good effects of an increased stock wherewith to trade, which is much wanting at this time throughout America. How preferable, how desirable is this, rather than to continue the debt, as an object of the worst kind of speculation, which diverts the capital of productive labor from the useful branches of manufactures, commerce, and agriculture. In short, the business of funding would be thrown into such uncertainty and confusion, as must fatally stab our public credit in its most vital part, tumbling to the dust the amiable form we are endeavoring to cherish and support. Public confidence would be withdrawn, and the plighted faith of America would be destroyed in the chaos that would inevitably ensue. Thus the motion, if it prevails, will injure the very men it is intended to serve.

Many of the original holders are my friends; I should wish them every compensation which they deserve. If it is thought proper to settle with the officers and soldiers over again, you may do it; but you cannot give them part of the advantage they have conferred on another. I am no holder of certificates, directly or indirectly, and am therefore as much disinterested as any man ought to be, who has to decide upon so great a national question.

The funding system of Pennsylvania was intended merely to serve the citizens of that State; but I believe that one-fourth of the interest paid on the debt she assumed, went to pay the citizens of other States; so that the scheme there could not be confined to the accomplishment of its avowed object, but was diverted to the advantage of foreigners, at the expense of her own citizens; operating, as I fear the proposed measure will, to the injury of those it is intended to benefit. I fear the danger of an improper decision, as it regards precedent, which, in all determinations, has considerable weight. An honorable gentleman from Georgia (Mr. JACKSON) has brought them forward on this occasion. He tells us that Government may interfere in contracts, because Governments have heretofore interfered, and adduces the statutes of limitation as a proof. These statutes never operate retrospectively to set aside former contracts, unless the contractors neglect to perform a reasonable action within a reasonable time. If the contract is touched, it is by the tacit consent of the parties; and this is essential for the well-being of the community, to prevent fraud and perjury. But where is there a Government that has violently interfered to destroy the contract with its citizens, and preserved its credit? The interest payable on the British funds has been reduced several times, but it has always been done on the offer of an alternative to discharge the principal. An attempt was made by the present minister to reduce the navy and ordnance debt, in 1784, but he was forced to relinquish his project, when its effects on public credit were exposed. Thus many things are wished for by those who have the administration, but which we are obliged to forego as inexpedient or improper.

Mr. MOORE observed, that it was agreed on all hands, and proposed in the report of the Secretary, that some discrimination ought to take place. It was, therefore, incumbent on the House to inquire how this might be effected with the greatest degree of equity. He supposed the result would be, that we are at liberty to pay the most meritorious first. Who constituted this class of citizens? He trusted the late army had an incontrovertible title to it. He could never believe that the men who stripped the soldiers of their hard earnings, by allowing them a tenth of their claim, would have the temerity to pretend that they had acquired the title of merit with their money, and that the soldier relinquished, with his certificate, the honor of his corps.

Had the present question been agitated in the hour of distress, when an army was essential to our defence, the arguments of justice and equity would have had their weight. Perhaps it is the soldier's misfortune that the question arises at a time when the object for which he was employed is secured. But, notwithstanding all that has been said, I am fully convinced that his claim is insuperable in equity. The soldier did not engage to fight your battles to be compensated with a certificate, acknowledging you were indebted to him; it was specie you promised, and specie he had a right to expect, or something equal to it in reality. The public faith was actually pledged to him for a compensation for his services; but will any one say the public faith was inviolably kept with him, when a certificate, worth but two shillings in the pound, was forced upon him as specie? The poor soldier, thus situated, was followed by gangs of speculators, who endeavored to impose on his judgment by the relation of artful and insidious opinions of the public capacity and integrity in the discharge of these acknowledgments. The soldier, incapable of detecting the specious falsehood, swallows the bait, and becomes the easy prey of designing men. The people felt and resented the injuries thus perpetrated on those they esteemed; and I am much mistaken if the citizens of America do not still retain favorable impressions of the soldiers' services.

Public Credit.

A great deal has been said with respect to public opinion on this question. It is impossible, perhaps, to ascertain the public mind with precision; but there is but one way in our power, that is, to suffer the subject to be suspended for the present session, and on our return, or the election of our successors, the public sentiment in this respect will be evinced; but if we are to determine the public mind from our own observation, I should not hesitate to say that nine out of ten would be in favor of a discrimination. The people would, on this principle, I conceive, submit cheerfully to the payment of those taxes which are requisite to discharge the public engagements; but if they are to flow into the large cities, or into the hands of foreigners, who have speculated upon the misfortunes of the most meritorious class of our citizens, they will bear the burden with murmurs and complaints.

Can any principle of justice demand the payment of the present possessor of a certificate, that does not apply more forcibly as it respects original holders? Will gentlemen, then, comply with the one, and neglect the other? Or rather, as my colleague has proposed, if they are incapable to pay both, will they not prefer a composition?

Mr. WADSWORTH.—It appears to me that we have mistaken this business from the beginning, for we are proceeding as if it was taken for granted that all those who had alienated their certificates have been compelled to it by necessity; there is nothing further from the truth. So far as it respects the army debt, it may be just; and at this moment, were a soldierly to be paid in certificates, they would part with them at as great a discount as ever. There is a disposition in soldiers, generally, to despise pecuniary considerations; if they want money, they will dispose of their property at an inconsiderable value to obtain it. But this remark does not extend to the industrious part of the public creditors, because they have carefully retained the evidences of their debt, and now will receive its value. But even of the army, it is not true that they will suffer the loss of the discount at which their certificates have been sold. Having an opportunity of being well acquainted with the circumstances of the army, I know that many of the officers lived upon their friends, who supported them, from time to time, with such sums as they had occasion for, seem to suppose. It is well known, that when a soldier enlisted, he received no mean bounty from the Government; but this, in many cases, almost in every case to the Eastward, was considerably increased by the contributions of private citizens. We are told, that, in Massachusetts, this sum averaged two hundred and fifty Spanish milled dollars, besides which, they were paid by the town the Continental wages. These towns were to receive of Congress the soldiers' pay, in order to reimburse themselves; but they gave the Continental pay up to the soldier; they let him have his final settlement, and were satisfied that the war was over, and the great object which they had in view was accomplished. This was a gratuity to the soldier, he received it, thanked them for it, and spent it. Perhaps soldiers were never better paid in any part of the world. There must certainly, then, be some impropriety in the term so frequently used, "the poor soldier." A fair and impartial statement of facts has shown that the American soldiery has been well paid; much better than the officers.

Mr. GOOPHUE observed, that the gentleman from Virginia, who has advocated this discrimination, having acceded to the proposition, that a contract, fairly understood by the contracting parties, and where a proper consideration was given, ought, upon no terms whatever, to be violated, it became the committee to try the question by this standard; and, it sometimes happens, that we are so blinded by existing circumstances, that, by reversing the scene in our minds, we are more likely to detect an erroneous sentiment, than by any other argument. Let us suppose, for a moment, that the late war had been prolonged to a degree, that the debt contracted in its prosecution became so enormously large, that the abilities of the United States would enable them to pay but five shillings in the pound, and a number of persons, who had purchased securities at ten shillings, should come forward, and pray they might be authorized to call upon the original proprietors to refund five shillings of the purchase money; can any one doubt what the answer would be? Would they not be told, from all quarters, that they purchased on the contingency of the public ability? That it might have happened, that they would have got twenty shillings for what cost them but ten. It has turned out differently; they took the risk upon themselves, and, therefore, must abide the loss. This has been the understanding which has universally prevailed; and every transaction of the United States, relative to assigned securities, as well as the security itself, in its very face, establishes such an understanding.

He further observed that, agreeably to his idea, public credit became a desirable object, chiefly for this reason, that, in times when great exertions became necessary, the public might avail themselves of services and supplies, beyond what they have money on hand sufficiently to command. This was to be done only by promissory obligations, and, in order to have any effect, and answer the purpose, they must be made assignable. He then asked, if the principle of a discrimination contended for, had existed during the late war; or, if it had been understood any advantage was afterwards to be taken of an assigned security, which assignment was legalized in the very security itself, what would have been the consequences? Would it not have put a period to our credit and exertions? Would not such a principle, now established, be an effectual bar to our future credit?

He acknowledged, that the case of many soldiers, and others, who, from necessity, were obliged to part with the pledges of their public service for a small consideration, was peculiarly hard, and they were entitled to our compassion and generosity; but not at the expense of our national honor and solemn engagements.

On motion, the committee now rose, and reported progress.

WEDNESDAY, February 17.

Mr. LIVERMORE, from the committee to whom was recommended the bill for establishing an uniform rule of naturalization, presented an amendatory bill, which was read for the first time; and

Mr. BURKE, from the committee appointed for the purpose, reported a bill to promote the progress of the useful arts, which was also read for the first time.

PUBLIC CREDIT.

The House again went into a committee on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. BALDWIN in the Chair.

Mr. MADISON's proposition still under consideration.

Mr. PAGE.—I do not wish to trouble the committee with a formal argument in favor of the motion offered by my colleague; but I wish to inquire of the gentlemen in opposition, whether they conceive the principles upon which it is grounded to be unjust? I observe, that their replies have generally gone against the practicability of the measure; but that does not prove to me that it is inequitable. If there is justice in the case, we must not consider the difficulty of the attempt. I trust, if it shall be found to stand on the foundation of immutable justice, that its practicability will be demonstrated. However, I shall not enter on that ground, but leave it to my colleague, who has so ably supported it on the other.

I would, however, beg gentlemen to answer these questions, and show to my mind the injustice of the United States complying with their engagements made to the first holders of certificates, as far as the case, and their abilities, will permit. Or where is the justice of doing more for the assignee than he, or his assignor, expected could or would be done? Where is the breach of faith in Government, if it pays its whole debt, with a justice, blended with mercy, resembling that of Heaven itself, making impartial retribution among the children of men, on the great day of accounts? Where is the propriety of branding a measure of this nature with epithets of infamy?

Public Credit.

[H. or R.]

Or using such harsh expressions as have issued like a torrent from gentlemen on the other side of the House? So far am I from viewing the proposition through such a discolored medium, that I am induced to believe, if Congress adopt it, they may submit its rectitude, and stand the decision, not only a superior order of beings, but of the Great Judge of the Universe, who is immutable truth itself.

What will the assignee lose by the measure? He will lose nothing, but the sanguine expectation lately raised in his mind.

Where is the interference in contracts, when the proposition is to comply sacredly, as far as the case will admit, with the contract between the State and its creditors? Is not the assignment of the certificates confirmed by the nation? Does it not give to the assignee the very thing stipulated between the assignor and assignee, that is, whatever sum the Government shall be pleased to pay for the certificate? And is not the sum now proposed, more than either the first or last assignee ever contemplated, till within a few days past, would ever be paid him?

The time is now arrived when justice ought to be done; it is looked for, with anxious expectation, by all classes of our fellow-citizens; it will not avail us to say, it is impracticable, until experience has demonstrated it to be so. But the measure we contend for is termed an ex post facto law, and as such, is declared to be unconstitutional. Gentlemen torture everything, in order to produce evidence against an act of justice. How can it be such an ex post facto law, as is proscribed by the Constitution, when that expression is conjunctive with a bill of attainder? It relates to that only, and can have no reference to the object of the proposition before us. The same idea, which prevents us from an interference on the present occasion, will prevent us, as was observed by the gentleman from Georgia, from making a statute of limitation, or for correcting any frauds, which have been perpetrated on the unsuspecting soldiery. We must not contemplate the restoration of the starving soldier, with his humble wife and numerous and naked offspring, to a more eligible situation; we must not restore confidence to the man of honor who is buried in abject poverty, because it is addressing a language to the heart, which the haughtiness of the head disdains to hear; but, in doubtful cases of justice, the heart is the best director on this subject; happy will it be for us, if, as I think, they both concur to give their approbation to the present measure.

And now, while I am up, I must add a few words in favor of freedom of debate. We have been told, that we have spent a week on this subject, that the public mind is extremely anxious, and requires to be satisfied; I hope, nevertheless, the decision will not be hurried. I do not conceive the impatience of a gallery, nor a thousand galleries, ought to influence us to a hasty decision. Men who cannot avoid expressing an impatient eagerness, ought not to be much regarded; those who would not listen to the oratorical performance, which favors their wishes, can hardly be expected to be gratified with a discussion in which other principles are advocated. I hope we shall patiently endure the subject, without showing an improper expedition in deciding a question on which so much depends.

Mr. Boudinot.—I consider the question now before us to be of the utmost importance to this country. I consider its determination as the key-stone to our political arch; if we place it in a masterly manner, it will be able to support any burden; but if we lay it without attention to its situation, or compose it of materials not of a durable nature, we shall injure the whole fabric, of which we may repent when it is too late.

I feel disinterested, but by no means regardless, as to the consequences; nor do I feel hurt by having the proposition so long before us. On the contrary, I find myself obliged to the gentleman who brought it forward, as it affords an opportunity of discussing a principle which has often suggested itself to my consideration. I expect that many advantages will result from a fair and candid examination of the question; and I have no doubt but it will be treated with the candor and deliberation it deserves.

I beg leave to mention, before I proceed any further, the situation in which I conceive we are placed here. We are a National Assembly, acting on national principles; we have the interests of the United States at large before us; we are not to consider this individual, or that, when the good of the whole is our particular object. If we lose sight of the well ordering of the whole Civil Society, we shall wander, and be drawn aside by the impulse of individual attraction, plunging ourselves every step into still greater difficulties, forgetting the great principle of distributive justice.

When I had the honor of replying to the gentleman from Virginia, I merely considered the measure, with respect to its impracticability, having taken, for argument's sake, its principles for granted; a fuller opportunity of considering the subject has enabled me to take up the general principle, in the first place with respect to its justice, and then as to its impracticability.

As there is no mode of gaining knowledge equal to a free, candid, and ingenious interchange of sentiment, I am pleased with the discussion that has taken place. From what I have heard, and compared in my mind, I am led to conclude that it is agreed, on all hands, that the original debt, with regard to the United States, was bona fide, just, honorable, and meritorious; that on these principles it was due to the original creditors. There is no pretension that the debt is unjust, or that we ought to do any thing to lessen it, for the benefit of the United States; if there was such a claim, I believe it is given up. It is also conceded, that the debt was contracted under an idea, that it should be paid in specie, according to the liquidation which has taken place, either for moneys loaned, supplies furnished, or services rendered; that part of the debt due to the army ought to have been paid, on every principle of justice, according to the precise terms of the stipulation. But a failure happened, on the part of the United States, from the peculiar necessities arising from the rage of war. In this situation, they were called upon for payment; being unable to make it, Congress did the best thing in their power. Knowing that a delay of payment was injurious to the creditors, they ascertained the amount of what was due, and gave an evidence of the debt. This being given, they went still further, and the Government made an express resolution, that the evidence so given should be negotiable by the holder; for on the face of the certificate, the contract entered into, appears, that the money should be paid to the original creditor, or bearer. This is an important part of this dispute, and ought to be noticed. That I may not be charged with speaking without book, I shall take the liberty of reading part of the report of a committee of Congress, which was afterwards adopted, and addressed to their constituents, which will incontrovertibly prove, that a great portion of the evidences of the public debt were transferred under an express act of the United States, that they should be paid to the bearer.

Here Mr. Boudinot read from the Journals of Congress those parts of the address to the States, by the United States, which had relation to his argument; from whence it was shown, that the domestic creditors had loaned their money for a term which had expired, or had become creditors, in the first instance, involuntarily. Now, as the principal could not be paid off, as in good faith it ought, the next thing for the Government to do, was to secure the punctual payment of the interest, that so the creditor might be enabled to transfer his stock at its full value, and replace to himself his principal.

They then proceeded to inculcate the necessity of the measure, regardless of the magnitude of the debt. It was enough for them to know, that it was honorably and fairly contracted, and that justice and good faith demanded that it should be fully discharged. They consider no other motive requisite to induce the discharge of the debt but its justice, yet, if there were others required, no nation had stronger. They were due to an ally; to individuals in a foreign country; to that illustrious and patriotic band of fellow-citizens, whose blood and whose bravery have defended the liberties of their country, who have patiently borne, among other distresses, the privation of their stipends, whilst the distresses of their country disabled it from bestowing them.

To a class of creditors, composed partly of such of our fellow-citizens as originally lent to the public the use of their funds, or have since manifested most confidence in their country, by receiving transfers from the lenders, and partly of those whose property has been either advanced or assumed for the public service—to discriminate the merits of these several descriptions of creditors, they say, would be a task equally unnecessary and invidious. If the voice of humanity plead more loudly in favor of some than of others, the voice of policy, no less than of justice, pleads in favor of all. A wise nation will never permit those who relieve the wants of their country, or who rely most on its faith, firmness, and its resources, when either of them is distrusted, to suffer by the event.

They conclude in the following apostrophe: "If justice, good faith, honor, gratitude, and all the other qualities which ennoble the character of a nation, and fulfil the end of Government, be the fruits of our establishment, the cause of liberty will acquire a dignity and lustre which it has never yet enjoyed; and an example will be set, which cannot but have the most favorable influence on the rights of mankind. If, on the other hand, our Government should be unfortunately blotted with the reverse of these cardinal and essential virtues, the great cause which we have engaged to vindicate will be dishonored and betrayed; the last and fairest experiment, in favor of the rights of human nature, will be turned against them, and their patrons and friends exposed to be insulted and silenced by the votaries of tyranny and usurpation."

This, gentlemen, was the language of 1783; it did honor to those who, in our seats, held it out to the world; let us not forget it, but nobly emulate their example.

Let us now proceed to consider the arguments advanced in support of the motion; they have been brought forward by the gentleman from Virginia, in such a manner as to entitle them to the attention of the committee; they were addressed to their judgment and understanding, and, as such, demand the most fair, candid, and decent investigation.

The public creditors are divided into four classes. First. Original holders, still in possession. Second. Those who have assigned. Third. Intermediate creditors who have assigned. Fourth. Present possessors, or the bearer. He then proceeded to consider that there was no doubt with respect to the first. In regard to the second, he could mention many persons in this situation as meritorious as any other sufferers; that the third might be passed over, and excluded from consideration; but if it was necessary, he could bring forward persons, in this predicament, as deserving of attention as any that have been named; but, said, he, I will not trouble the committee with the relation, as the gentleman has not held them up as objects of future indemnification. It is urged that public justice, public faith, public credit, and public opinion, are in favor of the first of the two rival classes, and it is not denied but the other has a defensible claim, yet, as we are unable to pay both, we are left to make a composition. This is the only remaining expedient, as we are to pay both; hence it is proposed to pay each ten shillings. It is alleged, that though this will not do complete justice, yet it will do more real justice than any other plan; the present holder will have a reasonable profit; the original holders will not be fully indemnified, but they will receive from their country a tribute to their merits. I will now enter on the consideration of the justice of the measure, though the honorable mover was aware that some objections, which he calls plausible in themselves, would lie against the plan; among these, I take it, is the impracticability, which I alluded to on a former day; but I will not discuss it on that ground; I will examine it on the principle of justice, laid down by the gentleman; but, before I proceed, I beg leave to remark, that, in all disputes of this nature, it becomes necessary to the argument to define, with precision, the terms made use of, otherwise we know not when we are applying them with propriety.

The honorable gentleman has assembled a number of terms, of which the committee may entertain different ideas. Original creditors, public justice, public faith, public credit, and public opinion. What is meant by original creditors? For that seems an important consideration, as it respects the present proposition. The gentleman does not suppose it to mean the person in whose name the evidence of the debt was issued. If that is the construction, I am willing to risk my reputation, that you will find the greatest part of the debt in the hands of those who were never real creditors of the United States. The original creditors, I take it, are those who actually loaned the money, furnished the supplies, or rendered the service; the contract was made with them, and not with their agent, the mere instrument of conveyance. What are we to understand by the term justice? Private justice is that conduct which is considered in conformity to the will of a superior who commands. Justice, between individuals, is to render every man his due; and what is the due, must be construed in conformity to the will of the Legislature. Public justice, in the United States, is a thing distinct from the public justice in other countries. Public justice, in England, must be considered in conformity to the will of the British Parliament, possessing the supreme power: but, in America, we have a precise line drawn; public justice must be the conduct of the Legislature, in conformity to the Constitution, under which they act, and the true happiness of the people; beyond this we have no power to go. I state this, because I think some arguments may be adduced from the Constitution, to evince that the Congress of the United States are not in the situation of the Parliament of Great Britain, or the Crown of France.

Public faith is a strict compliance with every promise which is not, from unforeseen accident, subversive of the general welfare. If we owe a man five shillings, we ought to pay five shillings, unless the payment of it would prove the destruction of the community, in which case we are not to pay it. Justice, with respect to Government, is distributive justice; it is justice to the community, and not to individuals alone; for if justice, with regard to individuals, will injure the whole, it is not distributive justice. Hence, the claim of an individual, that would deprive us of the means of self-defence, is not to be satisfied; and though it might appear to be injustice, with respect to him, yet it is that kind of justice which Government is bound to administer, whose first object is the preservation of the whole society.

Public credit, I take to be the confidence reposed in a State, or body politic, who are borrowing money; for the security of the payment whereof, a permanent annual fund is appropriated. Under this head, I shall proceed to examine the difference between the original creditors of the United States, and their assignees. The original creditors, I have stated, are those persons with whom the contracts were made. I have heretofore reminded the committee of the origin of this debt, and of the nature of the contract. From the acts of the former Congress, it appears, that Congress, in order to benefit those persons, whom they could not immediately pay off, gave to them an evidence of the debt, to which was annexed a negotiable quality. Hence the contract was formed upon the idea of the transferable quality of the certificates to be issued. The original creditor having, then, alienated his debt, under these circumstances, conveyed all his right and title thereto, under the sanction of the Government; the transferee is, therefore, ipso facto, the original creditor. This will be set in a clear light, by a reference to the face of the certificate itself, where the promise is not to the original holder alone, there is an alternative to A B, or bearer, either one or the other. Will any one say, the bearer is not concerned in the contract? How can you say to the assignee, that you have nothing to do with him in this business, when the resolutions of Congress, and the express words of the evidence acknowledged him a party in the contract, at least equal to the original creditor? The terms of the contract were understood previously to the loan, and, in many cases, before the supply was furnished, the negotiability of the certificate was held out as an inducement for the persons to enter into the contract with the Government. We ought to consider the original creditor, and his assignee, under the faith of Government, before an upright Judicature, contending for their different claims. The latter does not deny the original claim the other had; he only contends, that it is conveyed to him, and that he acquired it on the plighted faith of the public. Considering this in every point of view, I am free to declare that public justice requires the bearer to be considered as the original creditor.

I need not recapitulate the distresses of the United States at the time they pledged their justice, in order to call out the exertions of their citizens. The United States, in want of money, in a new and untried situation, surrounded with all the horrors of a doubtful war, failing of their usual resources, years pass away, and no provision is made for the discharge of their contracts; the Government proves inefficient, and new doubts and want of confidence arises. Is it, let me ask, any wonder that, under all these circumstances, the market should be affected? Gentlemen say, that the original holders did not receive a valuable consideration for their stock. What do they mean by a valuable consideration? Do they mean the full amount of what the certificate specified? This is no general rule; the circumstances I have already enumerated induced a want of confidence, and the whole mass of public securities depreciated. The holders, for various reasons, sold out at the best prices they could obtain; they shifted the risk from themselves on the alienee, allowing him one-half for the premium of insurance. What is the true value of paper? In pursuing this inquiry, does not every person acquainted with mercantile transactions—is it not the practice of every gentleman on this floor, to consider, in his purchase, the intrinsic value, and the adventitious circumstances connected with the property? If it is a note, does he not consider the credit of the party, and his ability to pay? Are there not tables of innumerable calculations to show what this true value is? Now, shillings and six-pence, five shillings, or ten shillings, is a reasonable allowance for a note of twenty shillings under all circumstances. But I agree with gentlemen, if they suppose fraud and imposition in the transaction, that it vitiates the negotiation, and such can and ought to be redressed in our Courts of Law. But if the contract is fair and open, it is valid. I will state an instance: I have a ship, with a valuable cargo, which I expect to return from India by a certain day; the time elapses, and three months pass away without hearing any thing respecting her; and, in short, she does not arrive within a period much more than sufficient to have completed the whole voyage. The probability is, that she is lost; I apply to have her insured; they ask me seventeen shillings and six-pence in the pound; I conceive two shillings and six-pence better saved than lost. Would any man say they were acting inconsistently with justice? I apprehend not. But would any man suppose I acted conformably to that principle, if, in a fortnight afterwards, the ship arrived, I was to refuse paying the premium stipulated, upon a pretence that I had not received of them a valuable consideration; that the half crown to be given to me, in case of loss, was by no means adequate to the premium I had offered; that seventeen shillings and six-pence was allowing them too much for what they had done. Would not every man laugh at me for terming such conduct either public or private justice? Now, let any man sit down, and, considering what was the situation of the United States, how much depended upon the successful issue of an uncertain war; how much depended upon the acquiescence of thirteen Legislatures; nay, what is the risk, at this moment, when every other risk is passed, that the transferee does not obtain the full payment of what was stipulated? Or, if he eventually succeeds, as to the principal, what he risks of the interest. Some people might make the calculation at ten per cent., and others at five; but there is undoubtedly some risk on the event of every public measure. Nay, at this moment, if your debt was funded, the probability that exists of a fall of interest would affect the principal. Your Secretary, in the report before you, says, that one hundred dollars, on that account, is not worth more than eighty-two; and Daremont calculates, with great plausibility, and,

I dare say, no less truth, that seven shillings cash is worth, at any time, ten shillings in notes of funded securities. If this, then, be the case in England, an old, experienced, and well established Government, I ask, what our securities must be worth—a young Government, without knowledge of finance or resources? I heard a gentleman say, that twenty shillings was the value of a certificate for that sum, because faith ought to be put in Government; but, I think, after this investigation, no such idea will prevail. It was said, also, that the creditors had received the interest. When was it paid? I was an original holder of two or three thousand pounds, part of which I lent in gold and silver; I never received interest, but for a short time, in bills on France, which, although for specie, were considerably depreciated, in paper money, and since then, in indents. Gentlemen know what kind of payment indents were; they were lower in the market than the principal. But suppose the interest had been regularly paid, it would not affect our reasoning. Let us suppose, by way of illustrating the conclusion, the war had taken a different turn; that, instead of being crowned with the noblest title of human nature, the assertors of liberty, and defenders of the rights of mankind, we had failed, and become "curved rebels," whose fate was suspended on the limb of every tree. Now, during the war, I bought of you, for fifty dollars, a certificate of one hundred dollars, which, in the event, turns out not to be worth a single farthing. Now, I apply to you, and tell you, that justice, good faith, and common honesty, require you to give me back the half of the nominal value of this security. Would not the natural answer be, that you sold it to me under its nominal value, by which I was paid for the risk, and that I have no right, in honor or good conscience, to require the return of any part of the purchase money? The risk has turned out for or against me; if your rule will not work both ways, it is not founded on just principles. Gentlemen must feel the weight of this argument, because it applies to their understanding. Then, from these considerations, I conclude, that the sale was a fair one. Where, then, lies the justice of the demand? That the original creditor is injured, I acknowledge; but by whom? The United States. Who ought to pay the damages? Those who caused the suffering. But to whom? I will instance a case. Suppose a bill of exchange, or a note of hand, is drawn on a man in New York; the holder calls upon him to inform him the bill is due. The man, knowing his circumstances, and incapacity to discharge the demand, which he acknowledges to be just, tells the holder of the note his situation; the holder must, of necessity, wait till the debtor restores his affairs; but having himself pressing demands for money, he brings the bill, bond, or note, into the market; the current opinion is, that the debtor is an expected bankrupt, and he gets no more than five shillings in the pound for the amount in the note. But the debtor's affairs having taken a fortunate turn, he is able to pay the full demand. Will it be just in him to say to the transferee, you gave but five shillings in the pound for my note, by which my friend suffered damage; now, to repay that, in some degree, I will pay you one-half, and him the other. I will turn to the enlightened and liberal merchant to know if this conduct is sanctioned by either the principles of justice or honor? In all cases of notes and bills, of a negotiable nature, the assignee stands precisely in the shoes of the assignor.

Here I may be reminded of the case of an executor, as contradictory to my principle. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. WHITE) says, the executor who obtains his testator's bonds at an undervalue, can retain no more in his hands than the sum he actually paid. I think this instance is against him, for he stands in the shoes of the assignor; not as an individual person, but as an executor; those whom he represents through his agency have the benefit.

But on what principle can a composition be urged? If the assignor does not receive more than the money paid, where is the justice of depriving him of the stipulated insurance? If the case could not be supported by the common practice of the world, how can it be supported where the case is much stronger? The dispute is between Congress and the bearer. Is not the contract as much between the United States and the bearer, as it ever was between the United States and the original creditor? I think I have clearly shown this to be the case. Why were your certificates made negotiable? On what principle, then, violate your contract?

Let us now, sir, test the dispute on the part of Congress, by the principles of the honorable mover. What says public justice? The Constitution, which is your creator, says that no ex post facto law shall be made. Here is the Rubicon—this is the line which you cannot pass. The gentleman from Virginia, who spoke this morning, endeavors, by the conjunctive disjunctive, or, to place the expression in another point of view, he supposes the ex post facto law alludes to bills of attainder; but he does not pretend, solemnly, to support this opinion. No, sir, the language is unequivocal, no ex post facto law shall be passed. But how do you support the claim of the original holder, who has transferred? By an ex post facto law. Is not the present proposition one? Was it not lawful and just to make these purchases? The ordinances of the late Congress invited to it—it was a quality they attached to the paper they issued, not without design. Shall the assignee be deprived of the benefit of a contract founded in justice, and which is secured to him in the most solemn manner? The same Constitution which proscribes ex post facto laws holds up the idea that the obligation of contracts shall not be impaired. If it forbids this to the States, is it to be presumed that it was meant to be allowed to the United States? But suppose this House had in their power, agreeably to the Constitution, to violate the obligation of contracts, will you set the first example? When the States are forbid, by the Constitution, to deviate from the line of rectitude, can it be presumed that the General Government was thereby intended to monopolize the right of doing iniquity?

But I have a greater objection still, drawn from the Constitution. It is violating the principles upon which the Constitution itself is formed; it is blending the Legislative and Judicial powers; setting up ourselves as a Court of Judicature, with authority. What becomes of that freedom which the worthies of America were anxious to secure and perpetuate? The destruction of the grounds which separate the two branches of the Government will enable them to run together, and collect into one body; and whenever this becomes the case, farewell to freedom—a Government thus formed can be little less than a tyranny. Does not every gentleman shudder at the consequence? But how are we to act as a Court of Justice? How are we competent to determine questions, in Justice and Equity, between citizen and citizen? I turn indignant from the idea; I would not disgrace the dignity of the situation by such a humiliating sentiment. Sir, I think myself a sovereign, whilst I am exercising the important trust committed to my care; and I never can consent to view a seat in this House as that of a judge deciding upon a question of property. I hope I shall not live to see the day which intermixes the Legislative and Judicial powers, because, I fear, that day will be the last day of our freedom.

But why exercise this authority? Is not the Judicial Department competent to decide every claim of right? Are there not Courts of Equity as well as Common Law Courts? Is not this question said to be a question in equity? If so, why not refer it to the competent jurisdiction? Why apply to Congress for a remedy which they have not, but which others have, and are inclined to administer? By our nature we are the worst of all courts? Have you heard evidence on the question? Who are the original holders? One gentleman tells you the office documents will show; another tells you there are no such documents there. I wish gentlemen would contemplate the precipice on which we are standing before they take the fatal leap. I beg gentlemen to view the subject for a moment in this point of light, and I have no doubt they will relinquish the pursuit. The honorable mover ably supported the ground he took. He did it fairly, and upon principle. But, from all the variety of considerations which he urged, I have not been able to select one which influences my judgment, though, I confess, if I saw my way clear, I should approve the object of benignity; but, sir, public justice is opposed to the idea.

What is the happiness of the people? Is it not concerned in our decision? Surely it is. The means to promote this end are within our power; their happiness requires us to administer their affairs, so as to secure their defence in times of danger. Now, if you hazard this you do a material injury. If, by doing what you call an act of justice, you put it out of the power of the United States to anticipate her funds, you do, perhaps, an irreparable injury to the nation. Four out of five, I venture to say, are still original creditors in possession. When you take up the state of the public debt, and see that the loan-office certificates alone amount to eleven millions and a half, and that all that has passed through the hands of the commissioners of the army accounts is but seven millions, call it eight, of which one-half must have been the property of officers; the other part, say four millions, has been paid to the soldiers. Now, when it is considered again what sums have been sold from other principles than necessity, the debt which is supposed to have this claim upon our equity will be found comparatively small. Now, I ask, will you not, in attempting to serve one, by doing him, at best, but partial justice, injure four in their undisputed rights? Because, I contend, their paper would fall in the market below what it would otherwise be. You injure, therefore, the original creditor, and, in many instances, the very man you mean to serve. What do you propose to pay in? Paper. That paper which you issue, and call ten shillings, is not worth so much as money, consequently, when it comes to market it will sell for less; at the next session you will be bound to make up the deficiency. This is to be done in the same manner; and thus we are to proceed from session to session, always providing for the discharge of our debts, but never able to ascertain or pay them.

I ask if our conduct would be consistent with public faith? You have received the full value of the security; you have, by the most solemn acts, authorized the transfer; you pledged the public faith, at the time of the original contract, to the bearer, as much as to the original creditor; you have repeated this pledge over and over again. Does not public faith, then, require the true and just performance?

If you find that public faith is in favor of the assignee, it is a strong argument that public credit is not against him. Will mankind give us credit for doing incomplete justice? What will the public say of our conduct? Here, say they, you have been transforming yourselves into a Court of Justice, to determine accounts, but you neither admitted evidence, nor permitted a trial by jury; you have stripped me of my property. I will not put myself under your protection again. In this way public credit will fall to the ground, and no man will, in future, lend you a single farthing.

If you give a new certificate for ten shillings to each, and it is brought into market, it will not command 2s. 6d. in every 20s. after you have established this principle. I acknowledge the proposition is to give the highest market price, 10s. And will this be a sufficient compensation? By what rule of justice do you proceed? Is there any line of justice to be drawn exclusive of the contract? Was not the moment of danger the time, and the parties the proper persons to judge of the contract? How would this stand between man and man? Yet there is more necessity for honesty, justice, and fair dealing, in a Government, than between private persons. In the latter, the want of these essentials may be disguised by hypocrisy and chicanery; but, in public transactions, all things are open. Shall we do, then, in the face of the world, what we would not be warranted to do in private life? Or what if we did, and were caught in it, would it not ruin our credit for ever? What is the reason we have more credit than the former Government? That consisted of individuals of the strictest honor and probity; and in them were collected the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial powers appertaining to the Government. A body thus constituted, comprehending all the functions of Government in itself, could not avoid deciding questions in such a manner as to evince that private rights were not undangered; yet its imbecility rendered it in no wise a dreadful enemy. Its various and glaring imperfections induced a change in the Government, and we have now secured, by a proper distribution of the powers, all the integrity and efficiency necessary to inspire a perfect confidence in its rectitude and execution; our deliberations are checked by the division of the Legislature into two branches. This, we may flatter ourselves, will secure personal property and private rights; but only while it does this shall we acquire and possess the public confidence.

Let us turn our inquiries to ascertain what may be the public opinion. An honorable gentleman thinks that ninety-nine out of a hundred are in favor of the original creditors; I deny the fact. Have gentlemen brought forward any kind of evidence in support of this assertion? What evidence have we at all of the public opinion being favorably inclined to them? None. I have been looking out, and find the best evidence the other way. I come from a State where there are few assignors; but the general opinion there is, that the contract cannot be so easily broken. I have evidence against discrimination—positive and negative. The positive is, the conduct of the States in their Legislative capacity. It is well known that several States have, at different times, taken up this business; but have they made a discrimination? The State of Maryland called in the public securities, and gave her own notes in payment, calculated on the scale established by the late Congress; but did she discriminate between the original and transferred stock? She did not discriminate. Pennsylvania exchanged her certificates for Continental ones; she did not discriminate. The State of New York funded, and paid the interest; she made no discrimination. And New Jersey funded these very debts, at six per cent. and paid the interest thereon without discrimination. These, sir, are positive proofs of what is the public opinion. But I can go further, and assert with confidence that a motion has been made in the Legislature of Massachusetts for a discrimination, and it did not even receive a second. From these facts gentlemen will be inclined to doubt whether public opinion is so decidedly in favor of discrimination as they have been led to suppose; but I will mention one additional circumstance; it is negative evidence, and therefore not absolutely conclusive. We have had no petitions or remonstrances on this subject; but in answer to this it may be said that the claimants are poor, and scattered over the country. This may be the case; but, if I may judge rightly, they are not poorer than many of their fellow-soldiers who have applied to Congress for their invalid pensions. Hence I am inclined to believe that public opinion is not so general in their favor.

This brings me to an important question. The parties are before us, both entitled to justice: What is to be done? The original holder is a sufferer; what is to be done with his claim, having received but one shilling and sixpence in the pound of his just due? I answer, he is exactly in the situation of the man who lost his all by the depreciation of the Continental money; and whose house was robbed, and then fired by the British; or of the inhabitants of Yorktown, Charleston, and Falmouth, whose cities were sacrificed to a ferocious enemy; with this difference, that the loss of the one was voluntary, on the principle of yielding a part in order to save a part; which comes within the definition of public justice. But if you extend the principle of justice impartially, so as to take in this case, let us inquire what justice would say? Suppose the case to be that of a private person before a Court of Equity, or even that of a nation before that Supreme Tribunal which forces the most potent to do right? A is bound to B in an express contract; A fails in the performance, which reduces B to distress; B, with the assent of A, sells to C, (by which he is considerably relieved,) though at an under rate, and therefore suffers fifty per cent. loss: C calls for payment from A, of his principal and simple interest: B calls for damages suffered by the breach of A's promise. Where is the Court of Law or Equity in the world, nay, where is the Court, in more pure regions, which would not give the debt to C, and damages to B, and both against A? There is no room for a decree against C. If, then, the argument of the people's happiness is brought in, and it is shown that such a decision is inconsistent therewith, this must be against the claim of B, but not against that of C. I well know the worth, the honor, and integrity of the gentleman who brought this proposition forward, and I would appeal to these qualities to answer me. Suppose, as an original holder, he was to have given him, by the United States, ten shillings out of every twenty he had assigned, at the expense of the assignee, would he not, on a principle of honor, return it?

It has been said, that public faith would not be hurt; there would be no more fluctuation in the stocks, as they would be placed upon permanent and competent funds, and out of the power of Congress. It has been said, that were France or England in our situation, some such interference as is now proposed would take place. In the reign of Louis XIII., the famous Cardinal Richelieu contrived several schemes for paying off the national debt; they were all arbitrary, and founded on the power of that monarch. The Parliamentary step proposed was, by an act of power, to reduce the debt from six to four per cent. Then he proposed to allow the creditors the simple interest only, and make them account for the sums received, and charge the balance against the principal. This, however, was rejected, because he found it would destroy all future credit. The next expedient was the same as now proposed, to reimburse the assignors the sums actually paid by them with interest; but finding it impossible to discover the truth, he rejected this also; and at last adopted the mode of paying what they sold at in market. The last, the Cardinal said, he found to be the most practicable and most equitable; but the famous Sir James Stewart says that it is the most arbitrary, most liable to abuse, and most opposite to public credit.

Early in the reign of Louis XIV. a Chamber of Justice was appointed to go through the investigation; but such was the labyrinth in which they were involved, that, after spending some millions in the attempt, they were forced to relinquish the design. Look at the Commissioners appointed at home but a few years ago, to settle the accounts, and consider the frauds that were imposed on them, and you will dread the experiment. But if it had been practicable in France, their Government is so totally different from ours, that no rule there would apply here; and the author I have named before, says, that had one-half of the acts of power been exerted in England, which have been so familiar in France; had half the liberties been taken in tampering with the claims of creditors, a total bankruptcy would long ago have taken place. He recites an act of power, which he supposes sufficient to deter moneyed men from lending to France on perpetual interest. It is the reduction of a hundred millions of Mississippi stock, charged on the ordinary revenue at two and a half per cent. This was, by successive acts of power, first reduced from an exorbitant interest to a moderate interest, and then down to two and a half. Could an act of this kind be perpetrated in America, and public credit survive the shock? But gentlemen have endeavored to show that Great Britain suffered no injury from a similar interference in the case of the South Sea scheme. I endeavored to investigate this business; but history does not furnish sufficient lights; I examined a great variety of authors; but my efforts were unsuccessful, till I turned to the Debates of Parliament, and there I found the whole of this business fully stated. Here I acquired the true history of its rise and progress. In vol. 8, A. D. 1721, I found the proceedings of Parliament thereon. The Court Lords, and those in opposition, crying out against the directors and others who had abused the act and intention of Parliament, a secret committee was appointed to inquire into their proceedings. The Lords examined many of the officers of the Company, with what success is shown by a subsequent resolution; in which they declare that the Sub-governor and Directors had prevaricated with them in giving false representations of several matters of fact: that by lending money on stock and subscriptions, and that they were guilty of a notorious breach of trust; and that they ought to make good the losses which the Company had sustained by their fraudulent management. A few days afterwards, after the doors of the House were closed, several members of the secret committee acquainted the House, that they had already discovered a train of the deepest villainy and fraud that Hell ever contrived to ruin a nation; which, in due time, they would lay before the House; and that in the mean while, in order to a further discovery, they thought it highly necessary to secure the persons of some of the Directors and principal South Sea Officers, and secure their papers. Three days afterwards they resolved that the transferring of stock, belonging to the South Sea Company, or giving credit for the same, without a valuable consideration actually paid, or sufficiently secured; or the purchasing stock by any Director or Agent of the South Sea Company for the use or benefit of any person in the administration, or any member of either House of Parliament, while the late bill in relation to the South Sea Company was depending in Parliament, was a notorious and most dangerous corruption.

On the 2d February, it was resolved, 1st. That the Directors, &c. buying the Midsummer dividend, about the 4th January, 1719-20, and paying five shillings down, and three pounds after the receipt of the said dividend, was a fraud to the persons with whom they contracted.

2d. That the giving a premium for the refusal of stock, at higher prices than they knew was the value, was a fraudulent artifice to raise the price of stock.

3d. That promoting the third subscription at one thousand per cent. was to answer a particular end, and to cheat the public.

4th. That declaring thirty per cent. dividend for the half year, ending at Christmas, and fifty per cent. per annum for no less than twelve years after, was a villainous artifice to delude and defraud His Majesty's subjects.

5th. That the declaring the Midsummer dividend to be paid in stock, when they had money by them to answer the same, was a notorious fraud, and was one occasion of the misfortunes that ensued.

The petitions that were read from the various parts of the Kingdom, praying justice, shows that the interference was for the support of the public faith, and not a violation of it. Those petitions set forth, that they had lent a great part of their estates on the credit of several acts of Parliament, for the public service; and that they thought they had sufficient security, but found themselves betrayed and given up by the managers appointed by their trustees, contrary to the true intent and meaning of the law, and contrary to the faith of public credit; and begging the justice of the House for relief against the fraud of the late South Sea directors, as well as the great and notorious breach of trust in the managers.

On the 29th of July, the King gave his assent to the bill for raising money upon the estates of the Governor, Directors, and others connected with the South Sea Company, towards making good the great loss and damage sustained by the Company; and afterwards the Parliament were prolonged to the 31st of the same month, when they met again, and the Commons, in answer to His Majesty's Speech, resolved, That for the re-establishment of public credit, relief be given to the South Sea Company, with regard to the payment of £4,155,306 4s. 11d. and the four and a half years' purchase, and one year's purchase upon several annuities and other national debts; the said Company giving such consideration to the public, and such further relief to the several proprietors, and persons concerned in interest with the said Company, as the House should think proper, and then proceeded to other similar resolutions, all calculated to relieve the distress of those who had been the dupes of the managers of the bubble. They discharged all persons that borrowed money of the Company upon South Sea stock, who actually transferred and pledged the same, from all further demands of the Company, upon paying ten per cent. on the sums borrowed. They prohibited the requirement of special bail upon actions brought upon any of these contracts, and the award of execution upon judgment obtained. Here, it is true, you find the Parliament of Great Britain interfering in contracts between citizen and citizen, but not in contracts between the Government and the citizen. Its avowed object was the restoration of public credit, and not its destruction. The event is rather a warning to us to be cautious how we interfere in any manner to injure the public faith, or tread upon public justice.

Thus have I given my reasons for differing with the motion on the table. I now come to the impracticability. When I replied to the gentleman on a former day, I mentioned this as an objection perfectly satisfactory to my mind; and I argue it:

1st. From the nature of the debt, which consists of Continental money, Loan-office certificates, lottery prizes, certificates of soldiers' pay, commutation, commissaries' certificates for supplies furnished, and services rendered, indents, the registered debt, and Treasury certificates.

2d. From the actual transfers which have taken place, with regard to States and public bodies; some States have adopted new loans, and received your certificates in lieu of others of their own, which gentlemen will not pretend to say they can discharge for less than twenty shillings in the pound. States have passed tender-laws to support these certificates. New York and New Jersey have taken measures of this nature. But besides, there have been paid into the Treasury of the United States a million of dollars, in certificates, for your Western lands; they were not paid in by the original holder, yet you gave value for them. The fines and penalties which have been paid, five millions of dollars, are already paid into your Treasury, for which new certificates have issued of this registered debt; three millions, perhaps, are in the hands of foreigners: consider the circumstances under which they became purchasers. They sent to the President of Congress; they had certificates from him that the amount of the debt could not be varied, nor its terms changed; it was liable to no liquidation; individual members of Congress gave similar testimonials. I believe they took the precaution of applying to your foreign ministers, and they obtained certificates from them, under which they were disposed to purchase into your funds. These circumstances are worthy of consideration; I do not pretend, however, that they should have weight, if their principles be not supported by reason and facts.

3d. Proof of the impracticability arises from the impossibility of ever discovering the truth, by the arts and devices which would be practised to disguise and conceal it; the want of documents to trace it, and the deaths and absences which may justly be apprehended.

4th. From the impracticability of the inquiry, and the time it would take a host of Commissioners, Clerks, and Judges, to go through it. You must adopt some general rule, and this would work injustice; or you must vest a discretionary power, in other words, an absolute power to be exercised by the Commissioners; and this would put the right of property in the gift of your officers, without the privilege of a trial by jury, where facts were disputed. If I say I am the original holder, because my name is on the certificate, how will you determine the contrary? But if these objections are not sufficient, my 5th Will preponderate considerably. The expense will be an insuperable objection. The Chamber of Justice appointed in France, which I have already mentioned in the affair of the Mississippi, sat some time in a similar investigation; they ascertained claims to the amount of two millions, and their expenses amounted to thirty or forty millions.

6th. From the injury to the indisputable creditor, by keeping him off, and turning him to the expense of a useless investigation.

7th, and lastly. From the absurdity of requiring men to subscribe to a loan, by which they must lose half of their principal.

In fine, sir, I am convinced that the measure cannot be adopted, as it is founded on wrong principles; but if even the principles were just, their execution is impracticable.

Mr. SEDGWICK moved the committee to rise; but several gentlemen opposed it with a view of having the argument continued.

Mr. WHITE wished the committee to rise, as he was convinced the committee was too much exhausted to attend fully to any further argument this day; and it would consequently put the speakers under considerable disadvantage.

The committee hereupon rose, and reported progress; after which the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 18.

PUBLIC CREDIT.

The House again went into a committee on the Secretary of the Treasury's report, Mr. BALDWIN in the Chair.

Mr. MADISON's proposition still under consideration.

Mr. STONE.—I shall not attempt to show the importance of the subject before us, as it relates to public credit; or as it will affect our character as a nation, at home and abroad. These have been explained; but it is proper for us to consider how far the amendment may operate to establish a precedent of Continental and State Legislation, the influence it may have on society, and the rules of civil conduct between man and man. Every community must experience that the conduct of the Government will influence the opinions of the individual; and the spirit of the individual will transuse itself into the Government. This action and reaction operates more powerfully in a Republican Government, founded on representation, than on any other.

Our situation is made more important, on the present occasion, by a disagreement on principles which ought to be fixed and plain; to me it seems that we differ on the principle of public justice. This may be unfortunate—let us endeavor to be reconciled. If the true distinction between natural and civil justice be accurately drawn, we may annihilate the point in contest. Agreeably to the principle of natural justice, no contract is perfect unless there be an equivalent; and that which we call a valuable consideration, on which to ground a contract, is founded on the idea of an equivalent, and presupposes it. And, I believe the idea of such a consideration being an equivalent, is the foundation of the validity of a contract, even in the English law; and is always carried into effect, wherever the execution is safe and certain; because I think, whenever it appears in any Court of Justice, that the consideration was not an equivalent, that then the contract is not carried into execution. The execution of the principle of natural justice then is safe; for instance, £99 19s. 11d. is not a consideration for £100, but a small sum may be a consideration for a valuable property; this does not arise from an infraction of the principle, but because the property may not have a determinate value in the society; and it would make judges arbitrary, legal proceedings extremely expensive, and contracts uncertain, if an extensive discretion as to the value was admitted. But whenever the consideration is so small and inadequate, as to appear so plainly and satisfactorily that the judge cannot be mistaken in determining it not to be an equivalent, there the contract is not valid.

Now, if we have received services from the soldier, and have given him paper, the question will be, whether that was an equivalent, and the paper a proper payment; or whether it is only an evidence of the debt? I take it to be a granted point that it was not a payment, but an obligation to pay whenever the United States should be able. It appears to me, then, that it was the duty of the person who received the paper, to wait a reasonable time; and the duty of the nation to make actual payment as speedily as possible. If the person who had received this paper had wantonly parted with it for nothing, I agree we should have been under no more obligation to pay him the expressed sum, than if we had paid the money, and he had flung it away or wasted it; but if, on the contrary, there was a delay in the execution of the contract, on the part of the Government, which compelled him to part with it, a compensation is equitable.

The same rule will apply between the original holder, or person who rendered the service, and present possessor or assignee; for shortness we will distinguish them by the names of soldier and speculator. The speculator, when he dealt with the soldier, must, from the nature of the thing, have induced him to believe that he gave him an equivalent for his purchase; and it might have been an inducement to the soldier to sell, to think he had something more than an equivalent; the speculator thought he had more than an equivalent, throwing necessity on the one side, and fraud on the other, out of the question. Then the confidence was equal, perhaps not a penny between them. I can hardly conceive the exchange took place on any other terms. You never can allow the confidence of the speculator to be estimated very highly, perhaps at not more than one for ten. For if it is admitted, that the speculator had entire confidence, he was guilty of a palpable fraud, and a violation of the first principle of justice; it amounted to this, that he gave ten pounds in money for £100 bond, which he was certain would be paid. I believe, if the case stood exactly in this form, no man would hesitate in deciding its illegality. If a man takes one hundred pounds for ten pounds, it is illegal; but suppose there was a risk, and this risk was considered by the speculator as little less than ten for one, has he not discovered his own mistake when he sees he gets an interest of sixty per cent. on his capital, and that capital tenfold? This contract then ought to be void on the principle of a mistake; and here you place the speculator between Scylla and Charybdis. If he really thought the certificates only worth one for ten, you can give him no credit for his confidence; and you will admit that he ought to be satisfied with a reasonable advance on his purchase. But if you give him entire credit for his confidence in Government, you must give him no credit for his honesty. If both parties had known of this event, the contract would never have taken place. If you pay the whole sum, the speculator ought to take no more than what he gave a fair equivalent for. Gentlemen who seem afraid of giving to the soldier a part of his original claim, lest they affront his nobleness of soul, made no scruple to offer the speculator ten times the sum he is entitled to, on the principle of natural justice, without any apprehension that his honor will receive a wound. If the claim of the soldier was extinguished by receiving two shillings in the pound of the speculator, upon what principle is it contended that the latter should receive more than distributive justice? Arguments proving that the justice due to the first has been satisfied by what has been done, apply with greater force to the latter.

It has been doubted, and a question has been agitated, whether we shall exercise the power of reconsidering these contracts, and whether a modification is constitutionally in our power? I will not go into this subject, or any other which ought to be taken for granted. I shall take it, that we are authorized, and do mean to interfere; you must act. Do you mean to pay the principal and interest now due? I believe not. Will you shelter yourself under the plea of necessity? That is impossible. I dare say, if the United States were sold, they would at least be worth six hundred millions of dollars; and we have but eighty millions to provide for. Having, then, the means and power, I trust you mean to exercise them; and as you exercise them, you ought to exercise them as justly as possible; then, to do this, you will, it is said, personify the three parties concerned—the United States, the original holder, and the speculator. I do not clearly comprehend the idea of a personified State; perhaps it arises from my dulness of apprehension. Man, in his natural capacity, is sometimes obliged to do what is considered unjust; but a State, when it has power, is not obliged to do what is unjust. The State, then, in this respect, is doing what an honest man would do, if he had the power of conducting this business as he thought proper.

The speculator comes to you with his bond, and tells you it is due. The soldier tells you that he has done service to a considerable amount, for which he never has been paid; and that those evidences of the demand which you gave to him, were obtained from him, for one-tenth part of what they were declared to be worth. The State says to the speculator, you have made a great deal, and out of a man who has risked his life, and borne every burden which human nature could bear, with the greatest fortitude which the most virtuous heart is capable of exerting, let him have a part back? The speculator answers, no; here is your bond. Consider again, replies the State, that the veteran's services, at the expense of his health and property, at the risk of his life, has saved you and yours; and not only that, but he is obliged to pay of your demand more than he has ever received. What is now his answer? Here is the bond, pay me my bond. Under these circumstances, supposing the State an individual, he might, without much infamy to his character, exercise the power which he has over his own bond, in order to do justice between the parties. He might say to the speculator, you had the soldier in your power; you did him injustice; we have you now in our power, we will do you complete justice, but no more. A private man could never be injured in his reputation by such conduct: indeed, according to the result of these circumstances, the hardships of war, and the breach of contract, has unfortunately inflicted upon the man, the most meritorious in this community, or perhaps in any other community, sufferings and miseries—a punishment sufficient to atone for the guilt of the greatest crimes. This, in the event, appears to be the situation of the saviours of America.

What sort of character are you to acquire by this conduct? According to your acts and merits, such will be your reputation. If you evince, by your determination, that you will reward merit, and do justice under every circumstance, to those who have acted meritoriously, such will be your reputation; and you will have the assistance, support, love, and veneration of those who are meritorious; but if, on the contrary, you neglect services of that kind, and are strictly bound to the payment of whatever appears due by you on paper, what will be the effect? Men will not be extremely anxious to serve you, but extremely anxious to get your bond. And what political influence will this have? It will be this, it will place you in the situation of most Governments in Europe, which do not depend for support upon the love and confidence of their own citizens; but depend altogether upon mercenaries, who are sure of their pay, because they will be paid; whenever they get your promise, they will compel the performance.

It is very clear from these sentiments, what we would do if it were in our power; but there is a difference between what we feel, and what we would do as individual men, and what we ought to do as a nation. I believe there is an essential difference between the executing of public and private justice; hence I believe gentlemen are mistaken when they attempt to personify a State. A great legislator (Solon) said, that the laws which he made were not the best possible, but the best the community were able to bear. The public must lay down general rules, which will operate more justice than injustice; and they must very often enact laws which they are almost certain will work injustice, but will produce benefit to the public, and secure the great interests, peace, happiness, and liberty of the community. I shall only mention one case; it is very clear, that when an act of limitation passes in any country, it will be productive of injustice, yet, in civil institutions, perhaps no act is more necessary.

Here we are to consider how far we may deceive the public, in the opinion heretofore entertained of this Government; how far we can exercise an arbitrary discretion in deciding on our contract, and departing from the letter of it, and the extensive influence this may have, it appears to be a dangerous and unhappy step. In its influence, it would introduce a lax mode of judging in all cases, legislative, judicial, and private. Can the peace and happiness of the community sustain the shock? It would be setting up a standard of justice different from the constant habits of the people. I myself determined to adopt measures calculated to do justice between the soldier and speculator, if any such could be devised, without breaking down those bulwarks. It would be agreeable to me, and I really have not yet subscribed to the idea, that it is impossible to do both. I would wish, if it be possible, to arrive at this point; that we should throw out inducements to those in possession of transferred securities, to return them into the hands of the original holders for a valuable consideration. And it appears to me this may be done, without such a breach of contract as is now proposed, by a discrimination in time of payment, and deducting from those certificates, the original sum or interest; and this would have this effect, those who are desirous of getting paid most speedily, would be most industrious in getting a re-assignment from the original holder. Suppose we were to fail in this respect, it does not appear to me that we cannot pay both those who hold them, and also something to them, who, in the early stage, parted with their debts for little or nothing. Besides the revenue arising from impost, I am well satisfied that other sources might be opened with perfect convenience. If for the payment of our foreign debt we have hard money, that would be all that would be necessary. If to pay the domestic debt we take paper, large sums would be paid into the land office opened upon proper principles. The citizens would be willing to bear a land-tax, if necessary to discharge the debt. A tax on carriages, and other sources of revenue, might come in, and to prevent the misfortune of suffering injustice, or violating the principles of Government, the whole of those taxes might be paid in paper, and, in this way, might be paid without much distress to the community.

These being my ideas on the subject, I shall vote against the proposition on the table; but if any mode can be brought forward, correspondent to what I have suggested, I shall vote for it. I am in favor of a discrimination, in point of time, but against a destruction of any part of the property.

Mr. MADISON said, that the opponents of his proposition had imposed on its friends not only a heavy task, by the number of their objections, but a delicate one by the nature of some of them. It had been arraigned as an embarrassing measure which ought to be facilitated, and producing discussions which might end in disagreeable consequences. However painful it might be to contradict the wishes of gentlemen whom he respected, he could promise nothing more in the present case than his endeavors to disappoint their apprehensions. When his judgment could not yield to the propositions of others, the right to make and support his own, was a right which he could never suffer to be contested. In exercising it, he should study to maintain that moderation and liberality which were due to the greatness of the subject before the committee. He felt pleasure in acknowledging that the like spirit had, in general, directed the arguments on the other side. Free discussions, thus conducted, are not only favorable to a right decision, but to a cheerful acquiescence of the mistaken opponents of it. They might have the further advantage of recommending the result to the public, by fully explaining the grounds of it. If the pretensions of a numerous and meritorious class of citizens be not well founded, or cannot be complied with, let them see that this is the case, and be soothed, under their disappointment, with the proof that they have not been overlooked by their country.

He would proceed now to review the grounds on which the proposition had been combated; which he should do without either following those who had wandered from the field of fair argument, or avoiding those who had kept within its limits.

It could not have escaped the committee, that the gentlemen to whom he was opposed, had reasoned on this momentous question as on an ordinary case in a Court of Law; that they had equally strained all the maxims that could favor the purchasing, or be adverse to the original holder; and that they had dwelt with equal pleasure on every circumstance which could brighten the pretensions of the former, or discredit those of the latter. He had not himself attempted, nor did he mean to undervalue the pretensions of the actual holders. In stating them, he had even used as strong terms as they themselves could have dictated; but beyond a certain point he could not go. He must renounce every sentiment which he had hitherto cherished, before his complaisance could admit that America ought to erect the monuments of her gratitude, not to those who saved her liberties, but to those who had enriched themselves in her funds.

All that he wished was, that the claims of the original holders, not less than those of the actual holders, should be fairly examined and justly decided. They had been invalidated by nothing yet urged. A debt was fairly contracted; according to justice and good faith, it ought to have been paid in gold or silver; a piece of paper only was substituted. Was this paper equal in value to gold or silver? No. It was worth, in the market, which the argument for the purchasing holders makes the criterion, no more than one-eighth or one-seventh of that value. Was this depreciated paper freely accepted? No. The Government offered that or nothing. The relation of the individual to the Government, and the circumstances of the offer, rendered the acceptance a forced, not a free one. The same degree of constraint would vitiate a transaction between man and man before any Court of Equity on the face of the earth. There are even cases where consent cannot be pretended; where the property of the planter or farmer had been taken at the point of the bayonet, and a certificate presented in the same manner. But why did the creditors part with their acknowledgment of the debt? In some instances, from necessity; in others, from a well-founded distrust of the public. Whether from the one or the other, they had been injured; they had suffered loss, through the default of the debtor; and the debtor cannot, in justice or honor, take advantage of the default.

Here, then, was a debt acknowledged to have been once due, and which was never discharged; because the payment was forced and defective. The balance, consequently, is still due, and is of as sacred a nature as the claims of the purchasing holder can be; and if both are not to be paid in the whole, is equally entitled to payment in part. He begged gentlemen would not yield too readily to the artificial niceties of forensic reasoning; that they would consider not the form, but the substance—not the letter, but the equity—not the bark, but the pith of the business. It was a great and an extraordinary case; it ought to be decided on the great and fundamental principles of justice. He had been animated upon for appealing to the heart as well as the head; he would be bold, nevertheless, to repeat, that, in great and unusual questions of morality, the heart is the best judge.

It had been said, by a member from Massachusetts, that the proposition was founded on a new principle in Congress. If the present Congress be meant, that is not strange, for Congress itself is new; if the former Congress be meant, it is not true, for the principle is found in an act which had been already cited. After the pay of the army had, during the war, been nominally and legally discharged in depreciated paper, the loss was made up to the sufferers.

It had been said, by a member from New York, that this case was not parallel, there being no third party like the present holders of certificates. This objection could not be valid. The Government paid ten dollars worth in fact, but only one to the soldier. The soldier assigned it to the citizen; the citizen then became the actual holder. What was the event? The loss of the original holder was repaired, after the actual holder had been settled with, according to the highest market value of his paper.

He did not mean, however, to decide on the whole merits of this last transaction; or to contend for a similitude, in all respects, between the two kinds of paper. One material difference was, that the bills of credit, by more frequent transfers, and by dividing the change of value among a greater number of hands, rendered the effect of less consequence to individuals, and less sensible to the public mind. But this difference, whatever force it might give to the claims of the purchasing holder of certificates, could diminish nothing from the claims of the original holders who assigned them.

It had been said, by another member from Massachusetts, that the old Government did every thing in its power. It made requisitions, used exhortations, and in every respect discharged its duty; but it was to be remembered, that the debt was not due from the Government, but the United States. An attorney, with full powers to form, without the means to fulfil engagements, could never, by his ineffectual though honest efforts, exonerate his principal.

He had been repeatedly reminded of the address of Congress in 1783, which rejected a discrimination between original and purchasing holders. At that period, the certificates to the army, and citizens at large, had not been issued. The transfers were confined to loan-office certificates, were not numerous, and had been, in great part, made with little loss to the original creditor. At present, the transfers extend to a vast proportion of the whole debt, and the loss to the original holders has been immense. The injustice which has taken place has been enormous and flagrant, and makes redress a great national object. This change of circumstances destroys the argument from the act of Congress referred to; but if implicit regard is to be paid to the doctrines of that act, any modification of the interest of the debt will be as inadmissible as a modification of the principal.

It had been said, that if the losses of the original creditors are entitled to repayment, Congress ought to repair those suffered from paper money—from the ravages of war, and from the act of barring claims not produced within a limited time. As to the paper money, either the case is applicable, or it is not; if not applicable, the argument fails; if applicable, either the depreciated certificates ought to be liquidated by a like scale, as was applied to the depreciated money; or the money, even if the whole mass of it was still in circulation, ought now to be literally redeemed, like the certificates. Leaving the gentleman to make his own choice of these dilemmas, he would only add, himself, that if there were no other difference between the cases, the manifest impossibility of redressing the one, and the practicability of redressing the other, was a sufficient answer to the objection. With respect to the towns burnt, and other devastations of war, it was taught, by the writers on the law of nations, that they were to be numbered among the inevitable calamities of mankind. Still, however, a Government owed them every alleviation which it could conveniently afford; but no authority could be found that puts on the same footing with those calamities, such as proceed from a failure to fulfil the direct and express obligations of the public. The just claims barred by the act of limitation, were, in his opinion, clearly entitled to redress. That act was highly objectionable. The public, which was interested in shortening the term, undertook to decide, that no claim, however just, should be admitted, if not presented within nine months. The act made none of the exceptions usual in such acts, not even in favor of the most distant parts of the Union. In many instances, it had been absolutely impossible for the persons injured to know of the regulation. Some of these instances were within his own knowledge. To limit the duration of a law to a period, within which it could not possibly be promulgated, and then take advantage of the impossibility, would be imitating the Roman tyrant, who posted up his edicts so high that they could not be read, and then punished the people for not obeying them.

It has been said that if the purchased certificates were funded at the rate proposed, they would fall in the market, and the holders be injured. It was pretty certain, that the greater part, at least, would be gainers. He believed that the highest market price, especially with the arrears of interest incorporated, well funded at six per cent. would prevent every loss that could justify complaint. But foreigners had become purchasers, and ought to be particularly respected. Foreigners, he remarked, had themselves made a difference between the value of the foreign and domestic debt; they would, therefore, the less complain of a difference made by Government here. It was his opinion that the terms stated in the proposition would yield a greater profit to the foreign purchasers than they could have got for their money if advanced by them in any of the funds of Europe.

The proposition had been charged with robbing one set of men to pay another. If there were robbery in the case, it had been committed on the original creditors. But, to speak more accurately, as well as more moderately, the proposition would do no more than withhold a part from each of two creditors, where both were not to be paid the whole.

A member from New York has asked, whether an original creditor, who had assigned his certificate, could, in conscience, accept a reimbursement in the manner proposed? He would not deny that assignments might have been made with such explanations, or under such circumstances, as would have that effect; but, in general, the assignments have been made with reference merely to the market value, and the uncertainty of the steps that might be taken by the Government. The bulk of the creditors had assigned under circumstances from which no scruple could arise. In all cases where a scruple existed, the benefit of the provision might be renounced. He would, in turn, ask the gentleman, whether there was not more room to apprehend that the present holder, who had got his certificate of a distressed and meritorious fellow-citizen for one-eighth, or one-tenth its ultimate value, might not feel some remorse in retaining so unconscionable an advantage?

Similar propositions, it was said, had been made and rejected in the State Legislatures. This was not a fact. The propositions made in the State Legislatures were not intended to do justice to the injured, but to seize a profit to the public.

But no petitions for redress had come from the sufferers. Was merit, then, to be the less regarded, because it was modest? Perhaps, however, another explanation ought to be given. Many of the sufferers were poor and uninformed. Those of another description were so dispersed, that their interests and efforts could not be brought forward. The case of the purchasing holders was very different.

The Constitutionality of the proposition had been drawn into question. He asked whether words could be devised that would place the new Government more precisely in the same relation to the real creditors with the old? The power was the same; the obligation was the same. The means only were varied.

An objection had been drawn from the article prohibiting ex post facto laws. But as ex post facto laws relate to criminal, not civil cases, the Constitution itself requires this definition, by adding to a like restriction on the States an express one against retrospective laws of a civil nature.

It had been said that foreigners had been led to purchase, by their faith in the article of the Constitution, relating to the public debts. He would answer this objection by a single fact: Foreigners had shown, by the market price in Europe, that they trusted the nature of foreign debt more under the old Government, than the nature of the domestic debt under the new Government.

Objections to the measure had been drawn from its supposed tendency to impede public credit. He thought it, on the contrary, perfectly consistent with the establishment of public credit. It was in vain to say, that Government ought never to revise measures once decided. Great caution on this head ought, no doubt, to be observed; but there were situations in which, without some Legislative interposition, the first principles of justice, and the very ends of civil society, would be frustrated. The gentlemen themselves had been compelled to make exceptions to the general doctrine; they would probably make more before the business was at an end.

It had been urged, that if Government should interpose in the present case, as interposition would be authorized in any case whatever where the stock might fluctuate, the principle would apply as well to a fall of sixty or seventy per cent. as to a fall of six hundred or seven hundred per cent. He could not admit this inference. A distinction was essential between an extreme case, and a case short of it. The line was difficult to be drawn; but it was no more incumbent on him than on his opponents to draw it. They themselves could not deny that a certain extremity of the evil would have justified the interposition. Suppose that the distress of the alienating creditors had been ten times as great as it was; that instead of two, three, or four shillings in the pound, they had received a farthing only in the pound; and that the certificates lay now in the hands of the purchasers in that state, or even at a less value, was there a member who would rise up and say, that the purchasers ought to be paid the entire nominal sum, and the original sufferer be entitled to no indemnification whatever?

Gentlemen had triumphed in the want of a precedent to the measure. No Government, it was said, had interposed to redress fluctuations in its public paper. But where was the Government that had funded its debts under the circumstances of the American debt? If no Government had done so, there could be no precedent either for or against the measure, because the occasion itself was unprecedented. And if no similar occasion had before existed in any country, the precedent to be set would at least be harmless, because no similar occasion would be likely to happen in this.

If gentlemen persisted, however, in demanding precedents, he was happy in being able to gratify them with two, which, though not exactly parallel, were, on that account, of the greater force, since the interposition of Government had taken place where the emergency could less require them.

The first was the case of the Canada bills. During the war which ended in 1763, and which was attended with a revolution of the Government in Canada, the supplies obtained for the French army in that province were paid for in bills of exchange and certificates. This paper depreciated, and was bought up chiefly by British merchants. The sum and the depreciation were so considerable as to become a subject of negotiation between France and Great Britain at the peace. The negotiations produced a particular article, by which it was agreed by France that the paper ought to be redeemed, and admitted by Great Britain that it should be redeemed at a liquidated value. In the year 1766 this article was accordingly carried into effect by Ministers from the two Courts, which reduced the paper in the hands of the British holders, in some instances, as much as seventy-five per cent. below its nominal value. It was stated, indeed, by the reporter of the case, that the holders of the paper had themselves concurred in the liquidation; but it was not probable that the concurrence was voluntary. If it was voluntary, it shows that they themselves were sensible of the equity of the sacrifice.

The other case was of still greater weight, as it had no relation to war or treaty, and took place in the nation which has been held up as a model with respect to public credit. In the year 1713, the civil list of Great Britain had fallen into arrears to the amount of £500,000. The creditors, who had furnished supplies to the Government, had, instead of money, received debentures only from the respective officers. These had depreciated. In that state, they were assigned in some instances; in others, covenanted to be assigned. When the Parliament appropriated funds for satisfying these arrears, they inserted an express provision in the act, that the creditors who had been obliged, by the default of Government, to dispose of their paper at a loss, might redeem it from the assignees by repaying the actual price, with an interest of six per cent., and that all agreements and covenants to assign should be absolutely void. Here then was an interposition on the very principle, that a Government ought to redress the wrongs sustained by its default, and on an occasion trivial when compared to that under consideration; yet it does not appear that the public credit of the nation was injured by it.

The best source of confidence in Government was the apparent honesty of its views. The proposition could not possibly be ascribed to any other motive than this, because the public was not to gain a farthing by it. The next source was an experienced punctuality in the payments due from the Government. For this support to public credit, he relied on what had been experienced by a part of the foreign creditors; on the provision to be made for the residue; and on the punctuality which, he flattered himself, would be observed in all future payments of the domestic creditors. He was more apprehensive of injury to public credit from such modifications of the interest of the public debt as some gentlemen seemed to have in view. In these the public would be the gainer, and the plea of inability the more alarming, because it was so easy to set up, so difficult to be disproved, and for which, consequently, the temptations would be so alluring.

The impracticability of the measure was the remaining ground on which it had been attacked.

He did not deny that it would be attended with difficulties, and that perfect justice would not be done. But these were not the questions. It was sufficient that a grievous injustice would be lessened and that the difficulties might be surmounted. What he had in view was, that for the convenience of claimants, some authority should be provided, and properly distributed through the Union, in order to investigate and ascertain the claims; and that, for the security of the public, the burden of proof should be thrown on the claimants. A scrutiny on this plan, aided by original settlements in the books of the army department, and the State commissioners, and other office documents, would be a remedy, at once, for all the difficulties stated with regard to fictitious names, certificates issued as money by commissaries and quartermasters, due bills, &c.

For some particular cases, special provisions might be requisite. The case of loan-office certificates, alienated at early periods, before they were much depreciated, fell under this description. Legacies might be another. He would have no objection to some special regulation, as to the payments of debts in certificates to persons within the British lines, said to have been authorized by the laws of New York; though he presumed few such payments had been made, and that of this few the greater part had, by this time, passed from the creditors into other hands. There might be a few other cases equally entitled to some particular attention in the details of the provision. As to the merchants who had compounded for their debts in certificates, or persons who had exchanged bonds for them, it could not be doubted that the transactions had reference to the market value of the paper, and therefore had nothing peculiar in them.

The expense incident to such a plan of investigation ought to form no difficulty. It bears no proportion to the expense already incurred by commissioners, &c., for effecting a less proportion of justice. Rather than justice should not be done, the expense might be taken out of the portion to the original sufferers.

The danger of frauds and perjuries had been worked up into a formidable objection. If these had always been equally alarming, no provision could ever have been made for the settlement or discharge of public debts. He reminded the committee of the frauds and perjuries for which a door had been opened by the final settlements, &c., of the frauds and perjuries inseparable from the collection of imposts and excises; yet these were all submitted to as necessary evils, because justice could not be done without them. The frauds and perjuries incident to this supplementary provision for justice must be very inconsiderable in number; and still more so, when compared either with the object to be obtained, or with the like evils already encountered in pursuit of a like object.

Great ingenuity and information had been exerted by the gentlemen on the other side in raising difficulties. He was sure that, after an adoption of the proposition, the same exertion would be used in removing them, and with such aid, the idea of impracticability would vanish.

Mr. BENSON.—I flattered myself some gentleman would have answered the question I stated when I was last up on this subject; but, as it is not done, I beg leave to repeat it; and as I understood the honorable gentleman from Georgia had put the answer upon the gentleman from Virginia, I submit it to him. Suppose I had purchased a certificate of one hundred dollars of him, which, when I go to fund, I find but the half allowed me, the other fifty dollars are retained in the Treasury for him. Now I ask whether, if I was to state to him the fact, he would take advantage of the law against me, and refuse to give me authority to take it up in his name? I do not wish to present this question in an indelicate manner. What I said before I say still, it is one on which I would not suffer my mind to deliberate, lest my passions should get the better of my reason; it is a plain question, and I admit but the simple answer of yes or no.

Mr. MADISON.—I thought I had answered this question, in some degree, when I was up before. I said it should depend on the circumstances of the transaction between the two individuals. If by the contract it was agreed, or the idea particularly understood was, that the assignee should be entitled to all advantages whatsoever, which the discretion of the Government should afterwards grant, then I believe the individual transferring would be restrained by a necessary scruple; but if the certificate had passed from hand to hand, both the parties knowing the uncertainty as to what steps the Government would pursue, I do not see that the most tender conscience need be restrained from taking the benefit of what the Government should afterwards determine. But it was to be remembered, that a greater part of the transfers had been made under circumstances that left us room to suppose, that original creditors were restrained from accepting an equitable compensation of their cases.

How would the observation apply to the case of the old depreciated money paid to the army? Suppose a soldier had paid away the money received by him, or assigned his arrears of pay, would the assignee be in equity entitled to the benefit of the act for making up the depreciation? Or was it ever understood that the soldier was bound in conscience to renounce the benefit in favor of the assignee.

I would beg leave now, in turn, to ask the gentleman a question. Suppose he had been one of those who resorted to our army at the time it was disbanded, and had found a soldier, one of that band who had established the liberties of his country, and had heard the declaration of his beloved commander, "that his country would finally do him ample justice," turned loose, not with the payment of gold or silver solemnly stipulated, but with a piece of paper, such as was substituted? And suppose that the gentleman had obtained, from the necessities of the soldier, the evidence of his claim at a tenth of its value, and had either received from the interposition of his

State the payment of sixty per cent. on his advance, or was now to have that interest with the principal, or even half the principal funded. I ask whether the delicacy of the gentleman would not be shocked at the reflection that this exorbitant accumulation of gain was made at the expense of the most meritorious part of the community, and whether his conscience could refuse a participation of it to the sufferer?

Mr. BENSON had no hesitation to say, that if the soldier made the application as a matter of right, he should reply, no, sir, I am in justice entitled to the whole sum. But if he did not put his claim on the footing of the contract, but merely addressed his benevolence, he would take his circumstances into consideration, and what he would then do depended on other principles than if it was a claim of right.

Mr. LEE thought the questions proposed by the gentleman from New York were highly improper and inadmissible in that House; that we were not assembled as individuals, but in a national character. It was our duty to do the best for the general welfare, and that no member had a right, in any manner, to insinuate that any gentleman in that House was governed in his political conduct by motives which, as an individual, he would condemn. He should not have risen, probably, at all on the question, if he had not felt his indignation roused by the language of the gentleman from New York; but having been thus brought on the floor, though he was very sensible of his incompetency to the task, he would, under all the influence of delicacy and diffidence, take the liberty of expressing his ideas in a few words.

The gentlemen who had argued against the proposition of his colleague seem to have resorted to those rules which are found necessary to regulate the intercourse between man and man in civil society, without regarding the great law of political association, which had for its object the safety and happiness of every individual in the community. The end of Government was certainly to accommodate all, and not to aggrandize a few; and every class of citizens ought to be regarded in the distribution of national justice. Nothing is more common in the history of the most virtuous and renowned republics, when brought into calamitous circumstances, than to see this great law superseding the forms established to regulate civil intercourse. Without such exercises of power, justice could not have been done, nor the nation preserved. And, in such a situation, no wise people will ever be bound by the ordinary maxims of Government; so that he had no doubt of the right of the Government to interfere on the present occasion. He also thought that, in all the deliberations of the House, the nature of our Government should be attended to. It was a Government of the people, and nothing like a coercive principle was to be found in it. In order, therefore, to make the administration of it salutary and honorable, our measures should be calculated to meet the popular approbation. Paying taxes was a serious thing; and to induce a free people to pay taxes, they must be convinced of the necessity and equity of them. And if the proposition on the table was calculated to reconcile the public mind to the requisite degree of taxation, every class of the public creditors would, probably, be finally benefited by its adoption. If, on the contrary, our measures should appear irreconcilable to the popular idea of equity and right, is it probable that they would meet with that hearty support from the community, which, under our Government, is essential to a prosperous administration of it? The general opinion of the people should have its due weight in all our deliberations; and he believed that the calm and unbiassed expression of the public mind, which was always found the best index of that which was just and politic. For his own part, he declared that he had always been convinced of the equity of such an arrangement as that proposed by his colleague, but that he had considerable doubts with regard to the practicability of such a plan, which were not yet altogether removed. But this appeared to him by no means a sufficient reason to prevent us from recognising the principle. This would be a declaration to the world, and to our constituents, that we did not disregard the great principles of natural equity; and if hereafter, on further investigation, the plan should be found impracticable, this would be a sufficient justification to us for relinquishing it.

He concluded with observing, that he had been unexpectedly induced to appear on the floor, and had hastily expressed ideas which were the ebullitions of the moment; and hoped, that, in future, the debate would be conducted without intemperate, in the most remote degree, that any gentleman was influenced by unworthy motives. For his own part, when he entered the House, he considered himself as entering into a sanctuary; and that every motive or passion which had not for its object the public good should be left behind. He did not doubt that every gentleman took his seat here with similar impressions; and expressed a hope that the final result of their deliberations would be that which would contribute most to the national honor and advantage.

Mr. SCOTT.—Inasmuch as he had expressed his sentiments generally on the subject now under consideration, when it bore a shape somewhat different from the present, and considering that, perhaps, he might be induced to vote in a manner that would not be understood without an explanation, he requested the indulgence of the committee whilst he attempted to offer his sentiments freely upon the business immediately under their notice.

The arguments of the gentlemen in opposition to the present motion, when taken altogether, seem to rest their whole force upon the idea of a contract said to be made, and of which contract the papers in question are said to be evidences. This is a doctrine which he absolutely denied. If those papers are evidences of any thing, it is of the pre-existing contract broken. At what period, sir, said he, did Congress contract with their soldiers? At what period did they contract with their citizens, who furnished the necessary supplies for our army? Was it at the time those papers were issued, or long before? It was long before. Consequently those papers cannot be considered as evidences of any contract, unless we refer to an implied contract made when they were issued, at the conclusion of the war; which, in fact, was the last conceivable period for the settlement of such engagements as had existed long before, and to fulfil which was totally out of the power of Congress. Surely, then, it must be allowed, since it was not in their power to fulfil the original engagements, and since it was not in the power of interested individuals to compel them to compliance, that the contract was completely annihilated, and Congress was reduced to the necessity of offering some consideration in lieu thereof. What did they offer? Paper of the nominal value of twenty shillings, but of no more real value than two shillings and six-pence. The original creditor, in consideration of the distress of his country, and from dire necessity, accepted of this; and would, with equal generosity, have accepted of the 2s. 6d. in cash, and have signed an acquittance for his pay, as freely as he signed over that paper for 2s. 6d. in cash, to the speculator. Now, if it be urged by gentlemen that this transaction implies a contract, it may be confessed the papers in question are evidences of such implied contract, but of the real existence whereof there is no proof.

He would also aver, that if we are to be governed by this implied contract, the real value of the paper in question is at once fixed by the market price, then current, at 2s. 6d. in the pound. The residue is the last grand sacrifice which the original creditors, as well citizens as soldiers, made to their beloved country. Thence it is evident there was no original consent of parties obtained; and hence no original contract existed. This, said he, is fair reasoning, it is no fine spun logic; but it is arguing from the truth, and the eternal nature and fitness of things.

But those papers, it has been said, are not only evidences of a contract, but since they are payable to A. B. or bearer, the bearer is an original contractor! Where will this argument lead us? A robber on the highway, a private thief, a fraudulent purchaser, without consideration, if this argument be admitted, may all, or severally, become bearers. Are they severally original contractors? Surely no gentleman will pretend to say that they are. Neither is it possible to detect those frauds, if what has been said is true, that many of those certificates were taken out originally in fictitious names. Suppose one of them has got into the hands of the robber, the burglar, or the thief, how will that man, who never existed, appear in court and convict him of the fraud? From these premises I shall infer, that as this was a case without remedy, the bare possession of a certificate is not a sufficient evidence to prove the holder was an original contractor.

At an early stage of this business, the gentlemen in opposition to the amendment appeared to lay great stress on the want of authority in Congress to intermeddle in such cases; but as we get forward, the gentlemen appear to give up—they have been beaten off that ground, and impolicy and impracticability of the measure is principally urged. Yesterday, however, these same gentlemen abandoned the latter, and resumed the former station with great eagerness.

We are likewise told, that although in the Parliament of Great Britain, which is omnipotent, they can do any thing; yet we, being a Legislative body, whose authority is constitutionally confined to certain objects, cannot make the proposed discrimination.

Let us make some inquiry into this. Is not the whole business before us of such a nature, that, without our interference, it must remain eternally as it is? This, it may be presumed, will be granted on all hands. What follows? That as it is a proper subject of Legislative discretion, the Legislature must, of necessity, and from the nature of the thing, possess all powers necessary to do what is right and just in the premises; and, consequently, we have the power of discriminating if justice and right demand it. The argument, therefore, which the gentlemen have adopted on this subject, as well as many others to which they have occasionally resorted, must appear to the committee as perfectly inconsistent and futile.

It may be necessary, however, to advert to one or two other examples of the same complexion. We are told, that the advocates of the proposed amendment are acting officiously; no complaints having been laid before the House; no petitions; no parties contending before us; therefore, say they, we have nothing to do with it; the question is not legally before the Court, &c. This is, in a similar phrase, "there is no writ sued out, no bill filed, no issue joined between the parties."

In answer to this argument, it is necessary only to observe, that every complaint of the people, by virtue of the representative capacity of their members, is properly, and to all intents and purposes, before the House.

But we are further told, that no facts have been proved; we have no evidence, therefore we cannot proceed. He granted that no witnesses had appeared to make evidence, no swearing in court, but will it follow from thence, that we are not possessed of the facts? He presumed not. If the facts are within our knowledge, we are in as full possession of them as if they had been sworn to; and for many other facts necessary to the investigation of this business, we can resort to our public records. Moreover, there is little use of evidence, other than to inform and convince the minds of the judges. As to the truth or fallacy of the objection, how that information and conviction happens, it is very different, especially in a Legislative body. In a word, the arguments to be contended with appear to move in so small and contracted a sphere as never to extend beyond the pleadings at the bar of a county court; and, consequently, were very unworthy of the attention of the great American Court of Equity.

He now remarked that, from these observations, it might be supposed he would vote for the proposed amendment; but he said he believed he would not. Not on account of the demerit of the proposition, or the merit of the arguments which had been used against it. There were other considerations which existed that were not only provided for in the amendment, but it seemed to him as if they were barred therefrom.

One of these, which came immediately within his own knowledge, and which must be likewise within the knowledge of many gentlemen in this House, one of whom had already mentioned it; it is this—our quartermasters, purchasers, contractors, &c., or some of them, have been sent out among our citizens to procure supplies, without a shilling in their pockets. They have bought on trust from individuals; afterwards those individuals have been prevailed upon (without payment being made) to give receipts, as if they had been actually paid, on a pretext that the accounts of the purchases could not be settled, nor money obtained to pay them, without those previous acquittances. Where this business originated he knew not, but he vouched for the facts in a great number of instances to have come within his knowledge. The consequence appears to be, that those purchasers, on producing the receipts, had obtained certificates for the aggregate sum in their own names, as if for supplies by them furnished, and have made no satisfaction to the individuals.

Now, with respect to this species of paper, thus procured by fraud, and issued without consideration given by the persons to whom issued, he could not consent to fund. Nay, he would sooner part with his right hand than consent to fund certificates thus circumstanced, and thereby subject those very individuals thus robbed of their property, to contribute towards paying the price of that very property into the pockets of their robbers.

Shall it here be said, "the courts are open, and the individuals may there be redressed?" Poor alternative, indeed! Were I to stand up on this floor and hold forth such doctrine as this, "that the courts are open; that the Constitution contemplates the United States as a body that may sue and be sued, and points out certain proceedings which shall be had when the United States become a party; and that, therefore, every holder of a certificate has the recovery of the money in his power, on application to the courts; and should I conclude that Congress has nothing to do with the present business." Pray, what should I merit by such pleadings? I doubt whether I should merit pity; contempt I might be certain of receiving.

Suffer me to ask, if the evil I have mentioned be not too general in its nature to admit of any remedy, but by Legislative interposition? May not many of those contractors be in a state of bankruptcy? May not some of them have travelled to the Spanish Main to govern Colonies? May not some of them have returned to their usual places of abode, at many hundred miles distance from the defrauded individuals, as aforesaid? And can it be supposed, that the widow and the fatherless, the poor and the needy, by them thus defrauded, perhaps of a bullock, or some bushels of wheat, individually, but in the whole, amounting to an enormous sum, can follow them to obtain justice? How are these plunderers to be pursued? And how can any thing be recovered from them in a common Court of Law? Especially when we consider that, to all the difficulties already mentioned, must be added, that the very receipts, under their own hands, would be exhibited as evidence against the injured, honest, original creditor! Is not this case, so often to be met with as it is, beyond remedy, unless by the interposition of Congress? Now, as this case is not only unprovided for, in the amendment proposed by the worthy gentleman from Virginia, but the door seems to be shut against a future provision; and, considering that the same gentleman, or some other, may bring forward something that may strike at the root of the evil, and produce more effectual justice, I shall, at present, vote against the proposition; but if I am disappointed in my expectation, and that gentleman shall bring his proposition again forward in the House, I shall not suppose myself debarred from voting with him.

Mr. SENEY rose and observed, that it was with reluctance he attempted to express to the Committee, his ideas upon a question which had been so fully and ably discussed. However, as it had been expected that gentlemen would not, in a case of such magnitude, be content with merely a silent vote, he rose to declare the reasons upon which his decision was founded. In doing this, he hoped that he should not use epithets which might be deemed harsh, or language which would be offensive; that although the sentiments of other members should differ from his, he wished so far to respect those sentiments as to treat them with decency.

He considered the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. MADISON) was designed to effect two purposes. The one, a compensation to the original creditors, who, during the late war, in times of distress, had loaned money, furnished supplies, and rendered military services; and who had only received satisfaction therefor in paper of inconsiderable value, forced on them by the public, and depreciated by their acts. This class of citizens, he conceived, had a just and equitable claim for the full difference in value between that paper, when paid, and specie. The other object of the proposition alluded to, was, he said, to compensate those creditors who now hold alienated certificates. Each description of those creditors had, in his opinion, claims on the public. The first was founded on an original contract between them and the Government, part of which only had been complied with, and the residue still remained undischarged. The other was grounded on having possession of the paper which contained the promise to pay.

It has been contended that the United States have not ability to pay both. In this case a question arises: What is, upon the whole, most just and expedient? Some gentlemen contend, that it is incumbent on us to make full provision for those who hold the assigned certificates, without any for the original creditors who have alienated them. Others think, that the misfortune of Government, in this respect, should not be felt by either class solely, but be borne by both. That it is more just to adopt a mode of composition, by which those creditors should mutually share in this misfortune, and be mutually benefited by a provision within our power to make; with those his sentiments accorded. He could not be impressed with the justice or reason of a measure calculated to make a total sacrifice of one class of creditors, and full payment to the other class. Such a step could not, in his opinion, be justified in any distinction or precedence which existed in their claims. When it was considered that the original creditors furnished money and supplies, and rendered services essential to the preservation of their country, and at a time when its liberties were invaded, and every thing which can be dear to freemen was in jeopardy and at stake, he could not apprehend that their claims would be deemed inferior to those of their rivals. In his opinion, these circumstances entitled them to superior notice. Believing, however, that the amendment under consideration would, upon the whole, effect more substantial justice than any other practicable scheme that had been proposed to the Committee, or which he had heard of, his assent would, therefore, be given to it.

He then noticed a variety of objections which had, in the course of debate, been urged against the amendment he supported. Gentlemen had insisted, that although the principle of it might be right and proper, yet the execution of the scheme was altogether impracticable. They had also contended, that the adoption of such a proposition would be a violation of those rules which, as to contracts, ought to be held sacred, and also of the Constitution under which the Government was then acting; that it would be disapproved of even by the persons for whose benefit the provision was intended.

He observed, that those who admitted the propriety of the measure, as to principle, could not be justified in their opposition, upon the ground of impracticability. That the honorable mover of the amendment had, in the course of yesterday's debate, suggested expedients, which would, in his opinion, remove the greater part of the objections which ingenuity had urged in that respect. That some particular cases, perhaps, might exist, for which special provision would be requisite. However, as that gentleman had declared his belief in the practicability of the system, such was his confidence in the sincerity and abilities of the person who made the declaration, that he was not disposed to believe the reverse without giving an opportunity of proof, or until some trial was made. It had been also observed, that the proposed project is violative of the rules which, in contracts, should ever be preserved; but how, he asked, could gentlemen reconcile this objection to the plan which they advocated? Would it not operate with equal force to condemn that, as well as every other, which had been contemplated? The argument, by proving too much, ought, therefore, to have no influence upon the question. It had also been mentioned, that the plan in controversy was a violation of the Constitution, which every member had taken an oath to support. This observation, he observed, might be made in terrorem, but could have little weight, if the words of the Constitution, in this respect, were attended to; these are, "all debts contracted, and engagements entered into, before the adoption of the Constitution, shall be as valid against the United States under this Constitution as under the Confederation." That the words debts and engagements, here expressed, would comprehend as well the residue still due to the officers, soldiers, and other original creditors, as the claims of the present holders of alienated certificates: and that if the Constitution created any obligation concerning debts, it had equal force with respect to every description of creditors. But he apprehended that the Constitution did not, by the words expressed, place any debts alluded to in a situation different from that in which they were previous to its adoption.

Great stress has been laid upon the practice of other nations. It had been frequently asserted, that the measure proposed was without a precedent in any country. It had been repeatedly recommended to us to imitate the British Parliament, as to matters touching public credit.

We however find a case was cited yesterday, by an honorable member from Virginia (Mr. MASON) in which they made a provision as to debtors, similar to the one now under consideration. If precedent is, therefore, to influence, we have one from the nation whose public faith has been above all others extolled. But it had been observed by an honorable member from New York (Mr. LAWRENCE) that the precedent then cited was not applicable, because, said the gentleman, the British Parliament and Congress are bodies very different as to power; the former is omnipotent and unlimited as to objects of legislation; the latter is not so, but restricted and confined by the Constitution, which controls their power; that the British Parliament can therefore do many acts consistent with their powers, which Congress cannot. This observation does by no means diminish the force of the precedent; because although Congress possesses not power, as to all objects of legislation, so extensive as the British Parliament, yet, as to objects within their power, they are as omnipotent as that Parliament. It will not be denied, that a provision, respecting public credit, is one of those objects; with regard, therefore, to the subject under debate, there can be no difference between the two bodies as to omnipotence.

It had been remarked by another member from New York (Mr. BENSON) that the adoption of the amendment would be improper, because it was unsolicited by those whom it was designed to benefit; and because there was reason to believe it would meet with their disapprobation.

The gentleman had informed us of a resolve of the Cincinnati of this State, disavowing the plan, and cited their proceedings as evidence to prove their disapprobation. In reply to this, he would not then inquire how proper it would be for the committee, in their decision, to be influenced by any act of the Cincinnati, or other society, but he believed, if the history of the proceedings alluded to was fully known, nothing could be inferred from it to effect that gentleman's purpose. That he had, since the publication of their resolve, been informed, that the meeting of the society, at the time it passed, was not a full one; that such a resolve was unexpected, by many, until proposed; and that it passed without debate, and, as it were, sub silentio; that he had since been informed, several of the body disapproved of the resolve, and believed, that if a full meeting was had, a different determination would be the result. He had conceived that the worthy members composing that body, had too much experience of their own sufferings, to be opposed to a provision in favor of those creditors for whom the compensation was intended, and could not think that such a provision would be disapproved of by a society of the kind in any of the States.

It had, upon this occasion, been asserted, that public opinion should have little influence on the conduct of Legislatures. But, notwithstanding the plausible reasoning he had heard upon that head, he was satisfied a regard was due and must be paid to the opinions of the people, and to their feelings. Government was formed for their benefit; under the present Constitution, all the powers of it flow from them as the source; they have the means of carrying into execution their will; and, under those circumstances, he could not believe the Legislature ought to be indifferent as to their sentiments.

Gentlemen had founded their opposition to the amendment, principally upon the rigid rules strictly adhered to in the courts of Common Law; rules which had often been the means of stifling justice, to correct the rigor of which Legislatures had often interposed. Such rules could not be used as fetters for the supreme power of Government. The history of nations proves that Legislatures are superior to them; their objects are extensive; and, in all extraordinary cases, they will make such provisions as may be requisite to effect general justice and equity. The case under consideration was certainly one of an extraordinary kind. He could not think that those whose exertions has rescued them and us from despotism and slavery, were ever honestly paid those hard-earned claims they were so justly entitled to; and could not but believe, that as long as those claims existed, so long there would exist a stigma on the justice, humanity, and gratitude of this country.

Mr. GERRY observed, that it was with great concern he should express his sentiments on a subject so important in its consequences; that after mature deliberation he had formed an opinion; but should arguments hereafter convince him that his opinion was incorrect, he should think it consistent not only with honesty but with honor to give it up.

The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia differed from the proposition before the committee in other points, besides that of discrimination; and he proposed, as an amendment to the amendment, to strike out all that related to this question, that the sense of the committee may be fairly ascertained, "Whether there shall be a discrimination between the original and assigned holders of public securities?"

He stated, that the foundation of the motion for a discrimination was the heavy losses sustained by our brave and veteran soldiers, in the sale of their public securities. Little or nothing had been urged in favor of meritorious officers, and of citizens who, by the loan of their property, had contributed to the support of the war, and much less of assignees; although he could see no reason why equal justice should not be done to these two classes of original creditors. To form a judgment, then, of the foundation of the motion for a discrimination, let us advert to the history of the army, and we shall find that their first enlistments expired at the end of 1775; that the Commander-in-Chief, not being able to re-enlist the soldiers, was reduced almost to the necessity of abandoning the extensive lines in the vicinity of Boston; that, notwithstanding this, such were the prejudices in favor of short enlistments, and such the dread of a standing army, that Congress were obliged to enlist the second army for one year, and their times of service expired at or about the end of 1776. During that campaign, Congress were so fully convinced of the fatal consequences of such policy, as, at all events, to determine that the next enlistment should be for the war; but they were afterwards constrained to provide the alternative, "or for three years," and those who enlisted for this term, left the army in 1780. We shall also find that, in 1780, the army was greatly reduced, and the States earnestly called on to recruit their respective regiments; but such were the prospects of gain, from privateering and other measures—such had been the sufferings of the army, and so weakened was the confidence in public faith, as to require enormous bounties in specie for obtaining recruits; the average of bounty, in many States, was two hundred and fifty dollars, in specie; and in Massachusetts, upwards of two hundred and eighty. Thus, then, if we divide the army into four classes, it will appear, that the soldiers of the first and second classes were discharged and fully paid in 1775 and 1776; that the soldiers of the third class, who enlisted for the war, between 1777 and 1780, served six, five, or four years, without any other prospect of reward than the stipulations of Congress; and that the fourth class, some who served two and an half years, others two years, and others one, were amply paid by bounties, the least of which amounted to one hundred dollars a year, or eight and one-third dollars a month, in specie, exclusive of the allowance made by Congress. The third and fourth classes were, however, entitled, by their contract, to six and two-thirds of dollars, in specie, per month, or to an equivalent, exclusive of bounties, rations, and clothing; and how has the contract been fulfilled? He then referred to a memorial of the officers and soldiers of the army, stating their grievances and Congress, in April, 1783; and likewise a resolve of Congress in July, of the same year, for liquidating the accounts of the army, and for issuing certificates which would then produce but two shillings and six-pence in the pound, for the balance due to each officer and soldier; and asked, is this a fulfilment of the contract? Was ever a brave army so paid before? If, then, the contract has not been fulfilled, ought not the party, failing to do this, to indemnify the party who have sustained damages? Justice may be in favor of the fourth class; but justice, generosity, and humanity, plead loudly for the third class, the amount of whose demands will not exceed two millions of dollars.

The question then is, Who ought, in justice, to make good these losses of the soldiery? Some gentlemen say, those who purchased their certificates. On what principle? From their having received them without an equivalent. Let us attend to the nature of the contract of the soldiers with the assignees; for it differs widely from that of a specialty or bond, and have carried us to Courts of Law, to prove, that whatever has been paid short of the nominal value of the certificates, is now due from the assignees. This mode of reasoning is inadmissible, because particular decisions of law courts cannot apply to great national questions; and the Legislature is authorized to regulate such courts, and is not to be regulated by them. But if admissible, is the transfer of a soldier's certificate in the nature of an assigned specialty? For, if not, arguments on this principle will fall to the ground, and we shall be again freed from Courts of Law.

He undertook to show what a bond was, according to the law definition of it, and that a certificate differed from it; as in the latter, there was no condition of performance, or seal, and in the transfer no endorsement is necessary. The title of an assignee to a certificate was by a sale, which is, "a transmutation of property from one man to another, in consideration of some value or recompense."

He further observed, that the public securities of the United States are a species of stock and property similar to merchandise; they are sold in open market, and at the market price, which is always an equivalent for the market price of stock was regulated by the public opinion, and depended, in a great measure, on the circumstances of the nation and on events. It had always been subject to great variations, and ever would be, whilst communities are subject to calamities; and this is a quality inseparable from that species of property. To illustrate this argument, he stated two cases, the latter of which was as follows: Suppose that the public debt was funded, and the stock at par; that a combination of European Powers had been secretly formed to subdue us; that a fleet, with a formidable army, had suddenly appeared on our coast, and that the enemy had landed before arrangements could be made to resist them, and had overrun half the country, would not stock, under such circumstances, be reduced in value? If a stockholder should insure his property in the funds, would not the policy be as valid against such an enemy as any other policy in time of war?

Let us suppose that this calamity had raised the premiums to eighty per cent. and the stockholder had agreed to allow it, would not the insurer be justly entitled to it for taking the risk? But if the stockholder, instead of giving the premium, had made sale of his property at eighty per cent. discount, being one-fifth of its former value, would not that fifth be an equivalent, and the sale valid? Where is the difference, except merely the mode of negotiating, between insuring his property at eighty per cent. premium, and selling it at eighty per cent. discount? Or, where as the injustice of the measure in either case? But should the enemy be expelled and stock again at par, can the original stockholder, in justice, demand any part of the eighty per cent. premium, or of the eighty per cent. discount, on a pretence that he has not received an equivalent? If the whole had been lost, would he have received the twenty per cent. which he received of the insurer or purchaser? Surely not. And it must be evident, that although the nominal was the real value of stock before the appearance and after the repulse of the enemy, yet that the value was reduced by the danger of conquest, and that the market price, at that period, was an equivalent.

Several cases have been cited as precedents for discriminating; that which relates to the reduction of the Canada bills, mentioned by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Madison) was, by his own acknowledgment, not applicable. The case referred to in the act of Queen Anne, cited by the gentleman, was not analogous; for, independent of other considerations, the debt contracted by the Queen, for the support of her household, was unliquidated; and, by a vote of the House of Commons, had been disallowed. Had the debt been liquidated, and certificates of it issued, as in the case of our soldiers, there would have been no interference of Parliament in the subsequent transfer of such certificates, as their whole conduct evinces.

Gentlemen in favor of discrimination have also mentioned the South Sea and Mississippi schemes. The gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. Boudinot) had clearly shown that the conduct of Parliament in the South Sea scheme was directly against discrimination; for although they imprisoned the directors and others, and confiscated their property, yet they never interfered in the transfers of stock by other proprietors, although it was bought and sold from par to thirteen or fourteen hundred per cent.

The history of the Mississippi scheme, I propose not to state fully; but to mention a few particulars. In the year 1717, the Government of France were deeply indebted, and had issued State bills to the amount of several hundred millions of livres; they were sold at sixty or seventy per cent. discount, and the Regent of France, desirous of appreciating them, established a commercial company, with the exclusive privilege of trading to the Mississippi, to consist of such as would subscribe sixty millions, payable in State bills at par; at first there were few disposed to be concerned, but at length the sum was subscribed; the stock, by another arrêt, was increased to one hundred millions; the farm of tobacco, amounting to four millions a year, was then granted to the company as a fund to pay the interest, and, under the direction of Mr. Law, they made greater profits from it. Stocks were thus enhanced from seventy per cent. below, to twenty per cent. above par. The India and African companies were afterwards incorporated with the Mississippi, whose capital was further extended, by which means stocks rose to five or six hundred, and in the progress of this matter, to one thousand per cent. At this period, a subscription was opened for fifty millions of livres, at ten for one, payable at ten different payments; and so infatuated was the nation, that the subscription, in a few days, amounted to seventy-five millions, being half as much more as was wanted; and the day after the subscription closed, those who had given one thousand, sold for two thousand per cent. When the bubble burst, as it is expressed, no attempt was made by Government to interfere in the transfers made by individuals, but all such transfers were valid.

From all which, I think it will appear that stocks are, in their nature, a species of property subject to great variations from calamities and other causes; that the market price will be regulated by public opinion, and that it is always considered as an equivalent. A transfer of property in the funds, at market price, differs widely from the gambling of stock-jobbers, a pernicious species of traffic, of the nature of wagers or bets; and those concerned therein have no property in the funds, and generally are subject to punishment.

Should inquiry be made, what calamity have we been under to reduce so low the price of our stocks? I answer, the calamity of a defective National Government, the effects of which were severely felt. In 1780, Congress called on the States to sink their respective proportions of the old paper money; part complied, and part did not. The consequence was that, in 1781, the bubble burst, and almost ruined the public credit. Early in 1783, the army, from want of pay, were nearly mutinying, and part of them soon after did mutiny, and drove Congress from Philadelphia.

Again, Congress, by the Confederation, were authorized to tax the States on a valuation of their respective property; but the States were unable to produce the documents required for forming that valuation, and refused to adopt a new rule proposed by Congress, who could therefore levy no tax. To evince an honest disposition, and to support public credit as far as possible, Congress proposed the plan of impost and supplementary funds. This was accepted by some States, and violently opposed in others, which produced apprehension that a considerable part of the Union wished to apply the sponge to the public debt. These circumstances, and the consequent commotions, so weakened the Government that we had no credit, public or private, at home or abroad. By these and other calamities, and the load of our debt, were the stocks reduced, the public opinion fixed their rates, and taking the risk, they were worth no more; but circumstances are now altered, and they are increased in value.

Gentlemen, to support discrimination, have charged assignees with fraud. Are the assignees chargeable for the defects of the Confederation? Or for a non-compliance of some of the States with the requisitions for sinking the old bills of credit? Or for the mutinying of part of the army? Or for defeating the plan of the impost and supplementary funds? Or for the consequent commotions? Or did the assignees deceive the original holders? Did they act the part of sharpers and swindlers? If so, bring the culprits to justice—your country demands it. But if their only crime is good fortune in their negotiations, if they have purchased the securities in open market and honestly paid for them, treat them as good citizens, acquit them of fraud, and do them justice. Being among those original holders who have transferred part of their certificates, and not replaced them, I can feel for myself as well as for our brave soldiers, but am against discrimination. So much for the justice of the measure. Let us now consider the policy of it.

It is admitted on all sides that the preservation of public faith is indispensable to the welfare of the Union, and in what does it consist? Public faith, as I conceive, consists in a punctual fulfilment of engagements and contracts on the part of Government. To preserve public faith, therefore, it is necessary that a nation should have adequate resources, the Government adequate powers, and those who administer it integrity and abilities. That our resources are equal to the payment of our debts, had not been denied; that Congress have not sufficient power, I presume none will assert.

The preservation, then, of public faith will principally depend on their integrity and abilities. Their abilities may not be questioned, but their conduct in this case will be critically examined, and tried by the standard of morality. If it will stand the test, they will have the confidence of the people; but if not, vain will be every attempt to establish public credit. For this is nothing but the confidence of the people in public faith, and the people will think that, whatever resources they may have, or power to change the form of Government, the defective principles of the rulers can only be corrected by the Sovereign of the Universe. Is it good policy, then, to rest the public faith on an act of discrimination, which is intended to saddle one class of citizens with a tax to repair the loss which another class has sustained by a breach of contract on the part of the public? This will wear the appearance of committing one fraud to cure another. The right of speculators to purchase certificates at the market price is undoubted, and their conduct in making the purchases and payments is unexceptionable; but if there was a doubt of this in regard to some, would it be a sufficient ground for a discrimination?

[H. OF R.]

Public Credit.

[FEBRUARY, 1790.]

Again: the whole expense of the war is supposed to be about 176,000,000 dollars, of which there is now due 80,000,000 dollars, exclusive of 2,000,000 dollars supposed to be due to the third class of soldiers. Is it good policy, by funding the debt, to do every thing necessary for the support of public credit, except making payment of two millions of dollars, and then, at the risk of public credit, by an act of discrimination, to save the sum last mentioned, which is but one eighty-eighth part of the expense of the war?

But how are we to obtain loans in future? Some gentlemen conceive the establishment of our funds will always precede the loans. Can any gentleman insure this? I conceive not. There is not a nation in Europe so happily circumstanced; and if an unfunded debt should again be requisite, who will lend when your unfunded securities cannot be transferred, because you have established a precedent for discrimination? Is it not evident, then, the proposition is pregnant with ruinous consequences?

If inquiry be made, what is to be done with the suffering soldiers? I answer, pay them, if your funds are sufficient; if not, assure them you will do it as soon as funds can be provided. It has been suggested that they have relinquished to the public seven-eighths of their property; if they have, I think it unjust to accept it. But this is the fact? Would they not have received the whole of their liquidated demands in specie, had it been offered? There can be no reason to doubt of this. Some gentlemen say they wish to compound the matter between the soldiers and their assignees, because we cannot pay both. Would not a composition on such principles be a declaration of national bankruptcy? And shall the United States, with three millions of inhabitants, with the most flattering prospects arising from the increase of commerce, husbandry, and manufactures; with such an extensive territory, and in the vigor of their youth, declare bankruptcy for a debt, including the Federal, State, and foreign debt, not exceeding $80,000,000, or £18,000,000 sterling; when Great Britain, with only eight millions of inhabitants, can fund a debt of £240,000,000 sterling? I hope not; and consenting to such a measure, I would never own myself an American.

Some gentlemen have referred us to the act of Congress for sealing the Continental currency, to prove both the policy and justice of a discrimination. Let us examine the matter. Congress, from the commencement of the war to February 1781, were but a meeting of State Commissioners, without any form of Government or powers, except such as were contained in their discordant commissions. From April 1775, to the end of 1779, they supported the war by artificial credit. At that period they had issued 200,000,000 of paper dollars, and borrowed 35,000,000 of dollars in loan-office certificates, which were afterwards reduced to 11,000,000 of dollars; they had borrowed all they could in Europe, and were reduced to the necessity of stopping emissions, and for depending on the States for monthly supplies of 15,000,000 of depreciated dollars, on domestic loans. In March 1780, the proposed taxes and loans failed; emissions on the former plan were at an end, and Congress were reduced to the necessity of scaling the old debt, to sink it, and of beginning anew, or of giving up the cause. Sad alternative! to violate the public faith or be enslaved! They chose the former, but aimed to do all possible justice. Indeed they had one reason for scaling bills of credit, which applies not to the liquidated debt. The public did not receive the value of the former, but did of the latter, according to the nominal sums; and had each emission been scaled according to its value when issued, the public would probably have been better satisfied, but having reduced the old bills from forty to one, did Congress attempt to re-scale them when they sunk a thousand for one? Or did they provide that original holders, who passed Continental money for less than they received it, should be reimbursed by the assignees? If not, the precedent is against discrimination. Indeed, if the precedent favored such a measure, it is admitted by the gentleman who produced it to have been a violation of faith, and is therefore a bad precedent, which can never sanctify a bad act, or alter the eternal rules of justice. Because, then, Congress, in a distressing war, without a form of Government, and at the end of their resources, violated their faith, can we, on a principle of policy, in a profound peace, with a strong Government and sufficient resources, be justified in taking a measure which promises so little advantage, and which may involve such dangerous consequences? If this measure is adopted, what is to be done with those who have given Congress a dollar in public securities, for an acre of land, such as you will now sell for one-fifth of a dollar in their own principle, as the assignee of the purchaser, to reimburse four-fifths of this property? But what security will a speculator in land have, when the value of the land is enhanced, a similar discrimination will not be made? And who, thus circumstanced, will purchase your lands?

With respect to the practicability of thus discriminating, gentlemen in favor of the measure have not removed the objections of those who are against it, and have only said a provision must be made in certain cases, without explaining. It has been said, if the latter will unite with the former, the difficulties, although great, may be removed; but no effort can make a measure practicable which is impracticable. Such attempts tend to weaken Government, and to bring the laws into contempt, as we have seen in regulating acts.

Public opinion has been mentioned as an argument in favor of the plan. I have the highest respect for public opinion, but have not argued on this ground: First, because in the present case, we know not the public opinion; and, secondly, because conjecture is endless and useless. Indeed, in great national concerns, the public will generally form their opinions by the proceedings of the Legislature, because the latter have a more general view of matters, and the best means for forming a judgment. If, on the whole, then, the justice, policy, or practicability of the measure was only in question, ought we to accept it? But when we are doubtful of all, ought we not to reject the proposition?

Mr. BLAND agreed in opinion with the gentleman who had just taken his seat. He was apprehensive the idea of discrimination had already worked mischief. He then explained the fallacy and injustice of such a measure, which he thought had been clearly proved to the House, and assigned, among other reasons, its impracticability, which, if there were ninety-nine reasons for it, that in itself was sufficient to make him vote against the amendment.

Holders will come to the Treasury and demand payment; there their claims must lie until proofs can be obtained. The same inconvenience will arise respecting the interest. Suppose a creditor, if the amendment should pass, was obliged to look for proofs, where must he seek them—in the grave? beyond the sea? in Asia? Suppose a creditor was unwilling to comply with this law, you must then pass another law to compel him to deposit his security.

The question had not been answered to his satisfaction, and he should not have risen, were it not on account of the point of discrimination, to which he had always entertained an aversion, as involving the loss of the most valuable and inestimable jewel, public credit.

If we commit this breach of public faith, it would be little better than the tender-laws of Rhode Island. No doubt some of the speculators had deserved punishment, but others are innocent. He observed that he was no speculator, but he held original securities, therefore the decision could not affect him. There is hardly a State in the Union that wishes for any discrimination. If the State accounts are to be all reckoned, what a day of reckoning would that be, to travel back and issue fresh notes; it would be two final settlements. In short, there appeared so much intricacy and difficulty, that it was utterly impossible and impracticable in his opinion.

Mr. LAWRENCE said it appeared to him that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. MADISON) had taken much pains with the subject, from the accurate manner in which he treated it. On this occasion he had been a listener often, a speaker seldom, and, of consequence, had weighed it with peculiar attention; but, nevertheless, it appeared to him that the gentleman had erred in principle. This had been sufficiently demonstrated by those who had gone before him; he therefore would not notice any thing on that point. But, as the honorable gentleman had put the propriety of the business on precedent, he would notice only those precedents; when the cause is committed to precedents for support, great care should be used to adduce such only as are applicable.

He confessed, after the Constitution under which they deliberated had gone through such a full investigation as it had done in the last session, as well as at the time of its formation and ratification, he could never have supposed that gentleman would apply precedents from an omnipotent Parliament to a limited Government, as a rule of action. If there was an analogy in the two Governments, he had not discovered it; but if he had discovered it at the proper time, he should have been as strenuous in opposing the Constitution as he had been in advocating that measure. He could not, under his idea of that instrument, refuse to admit, as a legislator, the rigid maxims of law and justice, as it regarded the property in dispute, which the gentleman had spoken so lightly of. After these observations, he would admit so much of the precedent as applied, but no more. The depreciation of pay allowed the late army is not a case in point. Here there are three persons, one to be benefited at the expense of another; there the soldier had justice done to him at the expense of the Government; but before the depreciation was allowed, Congress had determined that their paper had fallen in value as forty for one; but before the case can be parallel, Congress must determine that the certificates are depreciated forty for one; but this would be less unjust, if all the public creditors were equally affected; by the gradual reduction of the nominal value, the depreciation of the Continental money operated equally. But Congress were governed, on that memorable occasion, by another principle than is now contended for; it was policy which dictated the allowance to the army of their depreciation, not general and equal justice; if general justice had been attended to, those who left the army, as well as those who continued in service, ought to have had the depreciation of their pay allowed them; but they have never yet been allowed the depreciation. This demonstrates the principle which governed at that time to be policy; they feared, without this measure was put in execution, that the army would disband, and they would never be able to collect or keep another together. The Government having, at its own expense, on that occasion, done partial justice, is a precedent for doing what? For doing partial justice to one set of men at the expense of another set; speaking the authoritative language of despotism, and trampling the sacred rights of property under foot.

The next precedent adduced is that of the Canada bills. If my memory serve me, those bills were paid by the French army to individuals in Canada; afterwards they were purchased by the English merchants; but were they, in consequence, a claim upon the English Government? No. They were a claim upon the French Government. The individuals never could contemplate that it would be proper to involve the nation in a war for compelling the payment of those bills; therefore, it was their wish and agreement, at the treaty of peace, to accept of what they could get; but this was no violent interference on the part of Government to take from one class of its subjects in order to give to another class, or put in its own coffers.

With respect to the act of 1713, in the reign of Queen Anne, it is to be observed, that it affects the private or unauthorized debts of the Crown. In the reign of King Charles II. special provision was declared for the support of the Crown; if this specific revenue was exceeded, as was the case in the time of Anne, due bills were given for the debts contracted, due bills not issued on the authority of Parliament; and which sold, perhaps, from this circumstance, at a very great discount. It was supposed that the nation was under no necessity to discharge them, because with them there was no contract; but it is pretended in the present case that we are at liberty to refuse the payment of our certificates? Is there no contract existing between the Government and individuals? So far as this act is in point, it proves that the British Parliament interfered in altering private contracts, not between the public and individuals. The interference of the same Parliament in the contracts between the South Sea Company and individuals, proves equally as much; but neither of them proves that Great Britain undertook to do what is now proposed for us to attempt; but if they did, I hope an unjust or unreasonable measure is not to be adopted merely because it was carried into execution in a foreign nation.

[H. or R.]

Public Credit.

[FEBRUARY, 1790.]

The honorable gentleman, after having adduced these cases, asks if they affected the public credit of that nation? I answer, no; and the reason is evident: they were not attempts to violate the public engagements, or to injure the creditors of the nation.

It may possibly be contended, that there is no contract on the part of Government to pay these debts; but that idea will be dissipated the moment we read the words of the Constitution, "all debts contracted and engagements entered into before the adoption of this Constitution, shall be as valid under this Constitution as under the Confederation;" the words "as valid" make the Constitution as clear as words can make it; but one of the great causes which brought about the last Revolution was a desire which pervaded the community of securing the performance of Government; the too frequent interference of Government in this respect had been felt and acknowledged by all. Can we then suppose that the public opinion is to be gratified by a measure founded on principles which are rejected and despised? No; if we mean to give satisfaction, it must be by acting on the principles of national obligation, justice, and good faith; I believe we shall violate the whole of these if we adopt the proposition.

I do not put my opposition upon the impracticability, but on the right. I think it treason against the Constitution to break through the restraints and obligations it imposes; we cannot on any consideration violate our engagements. I suspect I was misunderstood in one observation; I will therefore repeat it, in order that it may be corrected. I did not say that the State of New York compelled the British merchants to receive their debts, due them from the citizens of this State, in certificates; but that, by the laws of the State, the individuals who remained within the lines were to receive of the individuals without the lines certificates at par; and that consequently such as remained in the hands of those to whom payments of this kind were made, were entitled, on every principle of justice, to the total of their nominal amount. I shall make but one other observation.

It has been frequently said, during the course of this debate, that the adoption of the proposition for a composition between the two classes of public creditors will be no more a violation of the Constitution than the adoption of the principles of the report; that a reduction of the principal is nothing worse than a reduction of the interest. But here is a material difference in the proposed measure; the Government, by the exercise of a despotic power, tears away the property of the individual; while, in the other case, the whole property remains, and nothing but a modification of its form takes place; nor this without the consent of the creditor. Whatever objections may be taken against this part of the report, it will no doubt be fully considered when the alterations come under consideration, and I trust fully and satisfactorily answered.

Mr. Ames.—Placing the proposition on the ground of precedent appears to be an abandonment of the principle of right; and the only principle upon which it can be contended will be that of expediency; yet nothing can have been more conclusively shown than has been the inexpediency of the proposed measure. If it is contended that the violation of rights by other Governments authorize us to pursue similar measures, and the application of precedents shows that this is the object, gentlemen need not to have travelled across the Atlantic in search of an example. They might have found instances of violated rights nearer home, they need not have gone further than particular States on these shores, and they would have discovered a warrant for any infringement of individual right. If there the business rests on the precedents which have been adduced, it will be proper to examine them. When the Parliament of England interfered in the South Sea scheme, it was not with a view of destroying rights, but in favor of them, and for their protection. The paper money of the late Congress, if I understand the transaction, is not at all in point. The Government paid the soldier in depreciated paper, and afterwards allowed and paid him the deficiency; nor did the person to whom that paper was paid away, ever suppose he had a claim to the after grants of the Government. The case of the Canada bills resolves itself into a transaction between nation and nation, therefore does not apply.

The case of the due bills, in the reign of Queen Anne, I can hardly conceive applicable to the present time; but, as was observed by the gentleman who preceded me, these due bills were issued for debts due on the Civil List; not by the sanction of Government, nor were they made transferable by an express act of the Legislature. The measure too was carried at the close of the session of Parliament with expedition, and probably without debate; but it is a rule that a measure agreed upon without debate, shall not be drawn into precedent; hence, if the case was in point, which is strongly denied, it ought not to serve as a precedent to guide our decision.

Gentlemen have told us that it never was contemplated either by the purchaser or seller, that the right to the real sum mentioned in the certificate was obtained and conveyed; but how does this doctrine comport with the many and solemn declarations of Congress finally to pay with honor and punctuality the utmost farthing? If this be popular opinion, let popular opinion choose its own instruments to effect it; for my part, I will never have an agency in effecting business which my principles—principles acquired by education and practice, and which, I believe, comport with those of my constituents—ever are averse to.

It is not on account of its impracticability that I oppose the scheme; it is because I conceive it to be unjust and dishonorable. I will only add, that the observations I made on this point, when I was up before, were not intended to convey any personal reflections; no man can respect more the honorable mover than I do; it is the measure, and not the man, that I oppose. I am well convinced, from the experience of that gentleman's candor, and his reputed integrity, that he is actuated by the purest motives, though I think him to be engaged in a bad cause.

Mr. Madison hoped the committee did not conceive, with the two gentlemen that had replied to him, that he meant by adducing precedents to abandon the ground of right. The committee will recollect that the gentlemen in opposition were repeatedly calling for precedents, and defied us to produce them, especially from Great Britain, which nation was held up to us as a model. They told us, that such an interference on the part of the Government of England would have annihilated that credit for which she is so respectable. Under these circumstances, the committee will think there was a necessity imposed on us to adduce precedent; and not that we did it to rest our argument on it alone, but as a collateral support, to show we had been challenged.

The committee rose, and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 19.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill providing for the enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, with several amendments, to which they desire the concurrence of the House.

PUBLIC CREDIT.

The House again went into a committee on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. BALDWIN in the Chair.

Mr. MADISON's proposition still under consideration.

Mr. LIVERMORE said he was against any discrimination between the soldier and other public creditor who held a public security, made payable to bearer, and consequently transferable, with intent that they might be sold, if convenience or necessity should require it. This had been understood by all parties, as well in America as in foreign countries, and they had been sold accordingly. The advocates for discrimination have not denied this; they have only alleged that the low rate at which the poor soldier or other public creditor had sold his securities was a sufficient reason for Congress to interfere and set aside the sale. In opposition to this, he observed, that persons had a right to buy and sell at such prices as they could mutually agree upon, provided there was no fraud.

A diamond, a horse, or a lot of ground, might be sold too cheap or too dear, and so might any other property; but Government could not interfere without destroying the general system of law and justice. Esau had sold his birthright for a mess of pottage, and heaven and earth had confirmed the sale. The distresses of the army, both officers and soldiers, at the time they received and sold their securities, had been painted in too strong colors. They were not so emaciated by sickness and famine as had been represented. They were crowned with victory, and received with applause by their fellow-citizens; and although they had been paid in paper, their loss had been made up by large bounties, and in other emoluments; so that, in point of property, they were equal to their fellow-citizens, who had borne the burden of taxes under which many are laboring to this day. Let them be called brave soldiers, patriotic soldiers, but not poor soldiers. They ought to be governed by the same system of justice that governs others; but their contracts ought not to be set aside out of partiality to them. The case quoted from the statute of Queen Anne is not applicable to this case, inasmuch as Government had not originally made the debentures therein mentioned transferable. Neither did the case of the Canada bills apply; for, as he understood, those bills were paid to British merchants and to others who had purchased them.

He concluded by saying that he would vote against the amendment, because no sufficient reason had been assigned that could operate on his mind against the general system of right.

Mr. BRANKE said that on Friday last he had laid before the House a motion for making a discrimination between original holders and assignees of public securities, and for establishing a scale of depreciation for those securities. This motion he afterwards thought proper to withdraw, as, on further consideration, he deemed it altogether impracticable, and because he was not convinced that such a measure was honest and consistent with the public faith. He did not therefore think himself at liberty to give it his support.

As to the question before the committee, he could consider it in no other view than as a question, whether we shall commit a breach of public faith with the domestic creditors of the United States; and violate those solemn promises so often repeated in appeals and proclamations to the people by the late Government, and a promise or engagement which has been reiterated by the new Constitution? In his opinion, it required no profound skill in politics or finance to answer this question: it is only consulting the dictates of common faith and common honesty, which command nations as well as individuals to fulfil their engagements.

The United States have repeatedly pledged themselves in terms as plain as language can express, to pay to the bearers a specific sum; and to commit a violation of this promise appeared to him both unjust and impolitic. If the United States are able to perform it, they ought to do so. He believed and hoped that they had the ability; and even in the case of inability, he was of opinion, should bankruptcy itself ensue from the honorable attempt to do justice, this would be preferable to a stain cast upon these States at the commencement of their political career, by a cool and deliberate act of public injustice to their creditors. America has established in the world a high military character. Let her but fulfil her engagements, and she will also establish a national character of honor and fair dealing. This will be to her as a real and substantial treasure, which she will be able to transmit, like a fair inheritance, to her children. Should we, on the other hand, pollute her by suffering her to commit a breach of honor, it will be such a public calamity as no money can compensate.

He wished to offer a few observations in answer to those gentlemen who were so urgent in favor of the motion. They had advanced that the officers and soldiers have not been fully paid. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Madison) has said that without the discrimination which he offers, we shall be raising monuments of gratitude, not to our officers and soldiers who fought for us, but to those who speculated on our securities. On this he would remark, that it is to be lamented, when our army was disbanded, the derangement of our affairs put it out of our power to pay them in specie. The States, however, did every thing in their power to provide for their soldiers. The State of South Carolina gave them bounties in lands, and the warrants and grants for these lands were passed through different offices without the usual fees. North Carolina, Virginia, and other States, gave similar bounties, he believed, without mentioning the lands appropriated for them by the United States. He would not say that the soldiers have been rewarded; for what reward can be adequate to their great services? But he insisted that the people of America had not been unmindful of those services. If we for a moment consider the conduct of the people towards one part of the army; (the officers,) we shall find that America has signally displayed her gratitude towards them, from the commander-in-chief down to the ensign. The illustrious leader of our armies, retiring from the field to private life, she again raised to the elevated station of a sovereign Prince! Through what motives? From gratitude for his splendid services. View the high departments of the General Government; look into the several offices; enter the several custom-houses, from the northern to the southern extremity of the continent; there we shall find conspicuous instances of gratitude.

Let us now see how the people regard the officers of the army in the different States. In South Carolina, no other class of citizens stand any chance in competition with officers; they are promoted to the stations of Governor, Lieutenant-Governor, and Privy Counsellors; they are to be found presiding in the tribunals of justice, in the Legislatures, and on the floor of Congress; and the gratitude of the people follows them in the private walks and ordinary occupations of life. They are justly held in love and veneration; and if the future historian of America records the truth, and nothing but the truth, he must raise lasting monuments, both of the illustrious services of the officers of the army, and of the gratitude and love of the people for those services. This he mentioned in answer, or rather in charge of ingratitude.

It is urged in favor of discrimination that a few speculators will make princely fortunes. This, he said, was a circumstance which he sincerely regretted; as he did likewise regret the speculations now carrying on from this city and other places, in the State of South Carolina—the sending pilot-boats secretly from New York to Charleston, while the people there were asleep, as it were; and totally unacquainted with the councils or views of the Administration, with information on the one side only; this he thought a hard case. But the speculators, availing themselves of this and a variety of other advantages, could not justify him, in his own mind, in giving a vote that would give a stab to the good faith and credit of a nation in whose councils he had the honor of a suffrage.

He foresaw, however, a still greater misfortune in this business, than that of a few speculators, aggrandizing themselves by our funding system: It is, that our public securities will go into the hands of foreigners. The present system, offered by the Secretary, is actually mortgaging these States to foreign speculators; for the amount of the debt; for the holders will sell, as they have already sold, immense sums to foreigners to raise ready money. Few of our citizens will become purchasers, as ready money will yield far greater emolument, employed in commerce or agriculture, than when lodged in the funds. This is a calamity which he lamented from his soul; but, upon a most serious consideration upon the subject, he was not clear but that a forfeiture of public faith, a loss of public credit, would be for America a far greater calamity. He entertained strong apprehensions, that parting with the fair inheritance of public faith and public honor, under any pretext, would be acting the part of him who sold his inheritance for a mess of pottage. Viewing the subject in this light, he could not, he dare not vote in favor of the motion.

He also mentioned another ground whereon he opposed it: The scheme of a discrimination appeared totally impracticable. Commissioners must

[FEBRUARY, 1790.]

Public

Credit.

[H. or R.]

be appointed, not only in different States, but in different places of the same State. If commissioners are appointed, for instance, in Charleston, the citizens must attend from the remotest parts of the State, and be worried in travelling backwards and forwards to seek for witnesses, many of whom may be dead, or removed into other countries—not to mention the length of time and the enormous expense which so complicated a business must occasion. He concluded, by declaring it to be his opinion, that the proposition, if agreed to, would throw things into confusion and perplexity, which he could not see the extent of: he should, therefore oppose it.

Mr. Madison.—If paper, or the honor of statues or medals, can discharge the debts of justice, payable in gold or silver, we cannot only exonerate ourselves from those due to the original holders, but from those of the assignees; so far as paper goes the latter have received the compensation. If honor can discharge the debt, they have received civil honors; look round to the officers of every Government in the Union, and you find them sharing equal honors with those bestowed on the original creditors. But, sir, the debt due in gold and silver is not payable either in honor, appointments, or in paper.

Gentlemen say it will work injustice; but are we not as much bound to repair the injustice done by the United States? Yet I do not believe the assertion has been established by any thing that has been urged in its support. The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. Strong,) acknowledges that there is a moral obligation to compensate the original holders; how will they get what he admits is their due? He is willing to make an effort by applying the resources of the country to that purpose; but if we are to judge by the sentiments of other gentlemen who have spoken on this occasion, we have little to expect from that quarter. Suppose the debt had depreciated to a mere trifle, and extinguished the certificates, let me ask, whether, if the United States had thus exonerated themselves from the obligation to the assignee, whether the claim of the original holder would not still remain in its full force in a moral view? But believing the point of justice to be exhausted, I will just add one remark upon the practicability. The transferred certificates, generally, will show the names of the original holders, and here there is no difficulty. With respect to those granted to the heads of either of the five great departments, the books of the Treasurer of Loans, as well as the accounts of those departments now in the Treasury, will designate with a great degree of accuracy, and this may be followed up by the usual mode of obtaining evidence; and I believe, every security may be provided against fraud in this case that was provided in the case of the commissioners who were sent into the respective States for ascertaining and liquidating the claims of individuals. That there will be some difficulty I admit, but it is enough for me that it is not insuperable; and I trust, with the assistance which the cause of equity and justice will ever obtain from the members of the National Legislature, they will easily be surmounted.

Mr. WHITE wished to ascertain a fact which had been mentioned. He did not mean to infer that gentlemen had related a fact they did not believe; but supposed they might have been misinformed. He asked, whether foreigners had been induced to purchase in our funds by assurances from the ministers of the United States, residing at Foreign Courts, that no variation would be made in the domestic debt.

Mr. BLAND asked his colleague, (Mr. Madison,) how long he supposed the settlement which he contemplated would take in its completion? For his part he supposed two or three generations might pass away before that object could be accomplished, considering the dispersed situation of the claimants through America, Europe, Asia, and Africa.

Mr. MADISON said, the claims of individuals were presented and liquidated by the Commissioners throughout the United States in nine months; that was the period fixed for that purpose by Congress; he would not say but it was too short, yet he thought this experiment fairly inferred that the ascertainment he contended for could be effected in a short time.

Mr. BORDINOR had seen an authentic letter, in which the writer mentioned that the opinion of Mr. JEFFERSON was asked, and obtained. He also had reason to believe the sentiments of the President of the late Congress were given to the same effect.

The committee now rose, and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, February 22.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments of the Senate to the bill providing for the enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, and agreeing to a part and disagreeing to other parts; a message was sent to the Senate informing them thereof.

PUBLIC CREDIT.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee on the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. BALDWIN in the Chair.

Mr. MADISON'S proposition still under consideration.

Mr. PAGE.—As the worthy and eloquent member who replied to me did not answer the questions I put to the committee, I suppose he either did not hear them, did not understand me, or could not answer them. I hope, before the committee decide, they will attempt at least to resolve them. I asked, where is the injustice of the States complying with its engagements made to the first holders of certificates, as far as the case admits? Where is the justice of doing more for the assignee than he or his assignor expected could or would be done? Where is the breach of faith in Government, if it paid its whole debt with justice blended with mercy? Where is the interference in contracts, when the proposition is to comply sacrilegiously, as far as the case will admit, with the contracts between a State and its creditors? I asked, is not the assignment of certificates confirmed by the motion? Does it not give to the assignee the very thing stipulated to be given, that is, whatever sum Government shall be pleased to pay for the certificates, for that was the condition of the assignment? And is not the sum now proposed more than either the first or last holder, till within these few days, supposed would be paid him? I asked also, ought not an honest assignee to be pleased that Government intends to do that justice to his assignor which he ought to do himself, were the whole payment made to him? I asked, of what is the assignee deprived but of his late sanguine expectations? I asked whether the proposition before us does not rather establish confidence in Government than the contrary? For, sir, to make use of the comparison which has been often made here between the State and an obligor on a bond, what could give more credit to any man's bonds than to find that though they had depreciated to half a crown in the pound, he paid the whole twenty shillings; ten shillings to the assignee, who had given but two shillings and sixpence, and ten to the obligee who had sold at so great a loss?

It is true Congress may, consistently with the rules of common law courts, pay the bearer and take no notice of the creditors; but were a Court of Equity instituted to decide on the case of certain speculators, how would they decide? Government, in the most solemn manner, pledged itself to make compensation to the soldiers, have they done it? Instead of doing this, certain persons, who took advantage of their ignorance and their poverty, bought up the evidence of their debt at one-eighth of their nominal value; and in some States these very men had drawn what constituted the principal of the purchase with six per cent. interest in three years.

In what does the case differ between the depreciated paper and the certificates? Paper money was redeemed at forty for one, as well to the last as the first holder; the same principle would lead to give the last holder of the certificate the depreciated value at which he bought it. But we propose to work no injustice, we give the first holder, if he is the holder still, the full value stipulated. It would not be unjust to consider the assignee, as having paid what he advanced, in consequence of his confidence in Government, on account of that Government; and that the Government ought to repay him what he so advanced; having repaid that sum, the balance ought to go to the credit of the assignee. I am willing, on this consideration, to call the speculator the friend and supporter of the Government, who kindly lent us, when in need, two shillings and sixpence in every pound, to advance to the poor soldier. If certificates are the evidence of the debt, it proves, sir, that the balance is due to him in whose name it issued. This is the day of payment, and we must pay accordingly; and here permit me to remark, in reply to the observation of the gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. LIVERMORE,) that Jacob was punished for his fraud, but for his faith enjoyed the promise; even so let us regard those who had so much confidence in us as to advance two shillings and sixpence to the distressed soldier.

Mr. HEISTER was in hopes this question would be postponed for the present, in order to go into a consideration of the ways and means: when, it appeared that the United States were incapable of making full provision, it might be considered, whether one deviation would not authorize the other? If any gentleman would make a motion to that effect, he would second him.

The question was now taken on Mr. MADISON's proposition for a composition, and it passed in the negative; yeas 13, nays 36.

Mr. WHITE observed, that the second resolution proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. FITZSIMONS) was now before the committee; he would wish to modify it, by declaring that permanent funds ought to be provided, instead of appropriated; because the latter seemed to imply that Congress were already possessed of the funds, which he believed was not the case; he also wished to extend the resolution, so as to embrace the civil and military establishments of the United States, leaving the surplus to be employed in just proportion to discharge the interest of the domestic debt. The plan of the Secretary seemed to contemplate the payment of four per cent. and gave a preference to those who subscribed to his new loan; by this means, the original holder who had retained his certificate, and who thought his claim more meritorious than the others, and who, in consequence, could neither afford, nor would be willing to accept of either of the alternatives, would be left unprotected for, unless there should remain a surplus after every other demand was satisfied. He thought no discrimination ought to take place, and that he conceived to be the sense of the committee; then the revenue should be applied in just proportion among the creditors.

Mr. FITZSIMONS would not undertake to say, that this was an unfortunate proposition; but it had certainly been treated as liable to many objections; however, he trusted he would not contend for words, so that the real object be attained; but he would ask, what did the gentleman mean by this motion? Does he intend that nothing more shall be provided for paying the public creditors than the impost now in collection? If he does, their claims will be but poorly satisfied; but he considered that no money could be raised by law unless it was specially appropriated. He hoped the funds of the United States would be found, under an economical and efficient administration, fully adequate to every demand upon their justice. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury placed it in this point of view, and it was the point in which he had long been accustomed to contemplate it. He was pleased to find himself warranted, in these expectations, by official information, drawn by a gentleman of ability, from indubitable documents, and some experience.

When he had the honor of bringing these propositions before the committee, he hoped their simplicity and singleness would have confined the debate constantly to the point. He conceived it to be time enough to enter into the minutiae, when the business was spread in the form of a bill. If the committee agree in the general principles and great outlines of the plan, the inferior parts might be accommodated with convenience, so as to produce a complete and uniform system.

Mr. GERRY objected to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. WHITE) inasmuch as it involved a breach of the Constitution; for, in the manner he had expressed it, the committee were to resolve, that permanent funds ought to be provided for the support of the military establishments of the United States, when grants of that nature are expressly prohibited from being for a term greater than two years.

Mr. WHITE.—If he was right in the principles of this motion, he hoped it would be adopted; but he would obviate the last-mentioned objection by striking out the word "permanent."

The proposition of Mr. WHITE being now reduced to a motion, a question was taken on the same; and it passed in the negative.

The question then, on Mr. FITZSIMONS's second resolution (see page 1138) being taken, passed in the affirmative.

The third proposition (the same page) being under consideration:

Mr. LEE said, he conceived this to be the proper place for us to determine the quantum of the debt which the United States are able to bear; how much of the debt we shall find, if we are not capable of funding the whole; and whether there is any part that has a less claim to interest being paid upon it than another; and in what manner such part ought to be provided for.

It is well known to every gentleman on the floor, that the United States have extensive tracts of vacant and uncultivated lands. Let us inquire, then, whether it would not be both prudent and politic to avail ourselves of this resource, and apply it to the immediate diminution of the public burdens? It is true, gentlemen seem pretty generally agreed, that the people of the United States are capable of bearing every burden necessary to the support of public credit. This I do not mean to controvert, they may be capable of bearing each his full proportion; but I would ask, what is their inclination? Do gentlemen suppose they are willing to bear it? For unless, in a Government like ours, the people are willing to bear it, it amounts, in my judgment, to an incapacity, and will, on public credit, have the same effect.

Our present circumstances are distressing; we were brought into this calamitous situation by the ravages, depopulation, and expense of the late war. It is our duty, then, as Legislators, guided by a magnanimous policy, to do the best we can, for the community so circumstanced. Let all our efforts tend in this direction, and we shall evince that our great object is the public good. This opinion, established on experience, will do more to perpetuate the blessings of good Government, 1st Con.—12 than all the theoretic systems that can be invented. Let us use our extensive Western country, to repair the ruin which has taken place; draw from the impost, or any other source of revenue, so much as can be obtained without distressing the community; but if it is not agreeable to go further, it is improper, and we ought to call in aid the fund to which I allude. Let the sales of land sink the arrearages of interest and indents; or let it be exchanged for them at a moderate and fair valuation. We here do the best we can—we have this fund, and they have our obligation. We do not wish the holder of indents to pay an extravagant sum for our lands—we are willing to sell them at a moderate rate.

If we can do complete public justice, let us do it; if we cannot do complete justice, let us do the best we can. We owe the interest, let us offer what we have of equal value, in order to make complete payment. After having provided for the punctual future payment of the interest and principal of the domestic debt, we can do no less than what I now propose, for the discharge of the indents and arrearage of interest. The measure, there can be no doubt, would give great satisfaction to our constituents, while it rendered the holders of securities full and adequate compensation for their claims. He concluded with moving, that the arrearages of interest, including indents issued in payment thereof, ought to be provided for by the sale and disposal of lands in the Western Territory.

This motion not being seconded.

Mr. GERRY inquired what it was intended by this resolution to do? Was it meant to fund the indents in the State treasuries? If this was contemplated, he feared that it would be a reward for delinquency; and this the committee would be convinced of, by referring to the manner in which the business was conducted. At the time that Congress authorized a State to issue indents in payment of interest on the domestic debt, they called upon her to pass acts for collecting and contributing her proportion of the same to the United States. Some States passed acts accordingly, collected them in, and transmitted them to the Treasury of the Union. Others have collected them, but never paid them over as required. Therefore it appears, that this last class ought not to have the benefit of having the indents in their hands funded, while others, who have shown a more prompt compliance with the calls of the Union, are prevented, by having performed their duty, and paid them over to the Treasury. With respect to the indents in the hands of the creditors, and the arrearage of interest, he had no doubt of the propriety of considering them as part of the principal; he would, in order to make the object of the resolution more pointed, move to alter it so as to read, "ought to be incorporated with, and made part of the principal," instead of "ought to be provided for, on the same terms as the principal."

Mr. FITZSIMONS said, there was no doubt but the intention of the resolution was, to make an equal provision for all, whether in the possession of the States, or in the hands of individuals. He saw no mode by which a discrimination could take place, if even the principle was just; but it was as much a fact, as that some States had neglected to pay over their quotas to the Federal Treasury, and retained the indents in their own hands, and still retained a considerable balance, which they were undoubtedly entitled to fund. He apprehended these requisitions of Congress must stand upon the same footing as all other requisitions; but in the interim, that a general and equal provision must be made for all; and this was the idea of the Secretary, as the whole interest, whether paid in indents, or unpaid, is calculated to be funded.

[H. or R.]

Public Credit.

Mr. GERRY would submit it to the judgment of the committee whether this was a just proposition, if they considered its operation? Suppose, said he, that one State has collected its full proportion, agreeable to the requisitions of Congress, and sent the amount into the Treasury of the United States, while another State has collected but half her quota, and has it still in possession; is justice or equity, that the State first mentioned, which has complied with its duty, should be under the necessity of contributing taxes to pay half the debt of the latter State? Yet this will be the result, in regard to every State which has paid its full proportion or less. If it will be unjust, as it respects those States which have paid but half, how much more unjust will it be as it relates to those who have not paid any. Will it not be better to let it be considered as a debt on account without funding it, liable to the final liquidation and settlement of accounts? Or, if we admit the States making defaults to place their indents in the general funds, we ought to provide that those States which have paid in those indents, either in whole or in part, draw back the same, or receive other securities to an equal amount, and then we may, on the principles of equity, admit the whole to be funded. But the best way to proceed will be, to consider the indents in the State treasuries, as in the Treasury of the United States; for he could not believe that it is meant that a State should have the benefit of its delay. He wished the proposition varied so as to embrace this idea.

Mr. LAWRENCE.—If gentlemen will only advert to this circumstance, the proposition, as it stands, will be admitted without any amendment. The several States have been called upon for several years past, for certain sums, in specie or indents, and those sums were apportioned according to their supposed abilities. These sums were not considered as their absolute quotas, but were left to be adjusted at some future period, when a rule of ascertaining the proportion should be agreed upon. Those States which complied with the requisitions, by advances of either specie or indents, are to be considered as making advances only on a general account; so that whether a State complied or did not comply, is quite immaterial, because, when those accounts are ultimately settled, each State will have credit accord-another State, disregarding of that duty, which has not complied. This unlimited proposition will determine, that the first shall contribute to fund all indents, which the latter has received, collected, and retained; but which they ought equally to have paid over to the Federal Treasury; and on the capital of this exclusive debt, she must labor to pay interest, until the final liquidation of accounts. Now, is there a State in the Union so flush of money, as to wish to contribute an unequal proportion to the support of this measure? Will it be satisfactory to those States which have furnished their proportion to be thus treated? Will they not contend, either that the whole be paid in, or that they be reimbursed by the issue or return of their proportion which they had already contributed? It appears that one or other of these modes ought to be pursued, as well for the satisfaction of States, as to conform to the principles of justice. The complying States could not but consider it oppressive and unjust, to contribute further sums, when they had done already what had been required on the principles of reciprocity; while those who had participated in the violation of public faith and the breach of contracts were rewarded.

Mr. LAWRENCE said, the gentleman's objection went against making any provision at all on this head; for saying that the indents should be left on the footing of the old Confederation was nothing more or less than rejecting them. If the National Government should decline funding them generally, the individuals would never get satisfied. The gentleman has supposed that it would be derogatory to the honor of the States that have not complied with the requisitions of the old Congress, if they were to give out the indents they have or may collect. He did not view it in this light, because he supposed every State had a right to use this property as it pleased, and wait the final settlement of the accounts. If she paid them into the Federal Treasury, the balance due her on settlement would be greater; if she neglected it would be less, so that the event would do equal justice, according to the nature of the case. But the ground of requisitions was abandoned, the mode of providing for the public debt was different, the General Government now operated on individuals. How then is it derogatory to the honor of a State, to use a property, which, mode of discharging the public debt being varied, we are not to expect that any State will pay a farthing on the old requisitions of Congress; what they have they will keep, and abide the ultimate adjustment; from hence, it appears that the mortification and ultimate proviso are unnecessary, even if the measure was within our reach, which it certainly is not.

Mr. LIVERMORE apprehended the general proposition made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, was embarrassed, by having in it the word "indents;" he wished, therefore, it, and all that related to it, might be struck out. He thought the indents issued by the former Congress ought to stand on their old footing, and be paid in on the requisitions. A great part had been already collected, so ought also the remainder; but if any part should eventually be left in the hands of individuals, Government might make provision for them. If gentlemen objected to strike out the word "perhaps," inserting "not," before the word "including," would produce the same effect.

Mr. FITZSIMMONS feared that gentlemen had not considered the subject with their usual accuracy; if they had, they would not embarrass it with a question of this sort. They would please to recollect, that the requisitions of Congress touching the indents were of the same nature as those of specie. These requisitions, as well the one as the other, were complied with by some States in full, in some by small advances, while others paid none at all; from these circumstances, it happens that a large sum is now due the individual creditors, either for the indents in their hands, or for the unpaid interest due.

The indents due on the requisition of Congress, in April, 1789, were 6,491,000 dollars; the specie was $3,521,000. Now, how can it be proper to call upon the States for the first balance, and not for the last? If it is meant that these balances should be paid, the State I have the honor to represent can have no objection; she has paid an equal proportion to any in the Union; but, I believe, no gentleman on this floor entertains a hope that the States can be prevailed upon to pay up the balance of the requisition in specie; this ground, I take it, sir, is totally abandoned; and if we mean to do any thing for the support of public credit, we must have recourse to some other mode of obtaining revenue. If it is intended to refuse funding the indents in the State treasuries, great injustice will be done, for the State of Pennsylvania has not only paid the whole required of her by Congress, but has a considerable balance in her treasury. For that State having assumed the payment of the debts of the United States, due her own citizens, has made provision for the payment of the interest in actual money; as she assumed more than her proportion of the domestic debt, she consequently drew interest in indents beyond the quota required of her by Congress; the balance still remains in her hands, and she is undoubtedly as much entitled to have them funded, as if she had issued them to her citizens, instead of the money she has paid for interest. The State of New Jersey is in the same predicament, and there can be no doubt but these two States, and every other in similar circumstances, would sustain real injustice, if the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts were to take place.

Mr. GERRY said, the arguments of the gentleman last up did not touch the question, because the amendment was not intended to affect the balance held by the States, which had paid in the indents required by Congress. The situation of Pennsylvania, ought, no doubt, to be provided for, but he did not know that any other State in the Union was in the same condition; but he was well convinced, on the principle of equity, that the delinquent States had no right to have their indents funded, and burden those which have already contributed their full proportion, with a debt they do not owe; he would state a case; suppose the whole debt of the Union had been proportioned and levied before the formation and adoption of the Constitution, and the State of Pennsylvania had paid in her full proportion, then she is, in justice, discharged from any other or further contribution; but the new Constitution having taken place the delinquent States obliges her to take up part of their burdens; they levy a direct tax, and make her pay a second proportion. Would this be consistent with justice? It would not; yet the proposition stands upon the same principle. Would the States, who have performed their duty, submit to such oppression? It could hardly be expected of them. But if they acquiesced for the sake of preserving the harmony of the Union, is it likely that the delinquent States would ever incur in, or aid the final settlement of the accounts, which would bring the old load upon the shoulders of the majority, and render that distributive justice which they now evade? Whatever may be the event, it is certain that it would be their interest to avoid the final adjustment of the expenditures.

Gentlemen say, that individuals will be affected by the restriction which I have contemplated; but how will they be affected? Advantageously; for I would ask any gentleman, if the funds will not yield a greater proportion as the debt is less, and if this will not secure a more punctual and complete payment than when the debt is increased by the addition of the indents already in the State treasuries? But there is a real distinction between the specie requisitions, and the requisitions of indents. Specie was to be collected of the inhabitants, without a certainty of a return; but indents were first lent by Congress to the States, and they were to return them after having made the use of them for which they were issued; some States have paid the whole back, others have paid little or none. Now, what was the contract? That every State should return the indents that were advanced to them. It cannot, therefore, be consistent with justice, to burden the complying States with a load of debt, accumulated, and applied by the defaulting States to their exclusive advantage, without any other than a very remote expectation of reimbursement at the final settlement of accounts.

Mr. FITZSIMONS was apprehensive lest an amendment of the kind proposed should embarrass the business. How could the gentleman make the exceptions he had admitted to be proper? The claim of Pennsylvania was indisputable; but, perhaps, other States might have the same justice due to them, in cases where their claim might not be altogether so apparent.

Mr. CLYMER said, the gentleman ought to qualify his amendment, so as to speak the language of his own explanation. He ought to accept only those indents collected into the State treasuries, for the purpose of complying with the requisitions of Congress.

Mr. BENSON.—The motion for amending the original proposition, appeared to him to stand on a principle rejected by the committee. It would be an unavailing discrimination; because the power of the General Government could not reach the case; suppose this State were to direct its Treasurer to sell the indents in his possession, and buy certificates, or if it were to order them to be exchanged or paid away, how would the Congress prevent the measure? This Government does not operate on States, as the Confederation did; it operates on individuals, and who is to be punished for the act of the State? Has Congress authority to forbid the sale, or to punish the disobedience of its order, in this case? It is a delicate question, and ought not to be unnecessarily agitated.

Mr. HUNTINGTON had some suspicion that a resolution like that proposed would tend to embarrass the final settlement of the accounts; and for that, as well as the other reasons suggested, he would vote against it.

Mr. GERRY.—The gentleman from New York says, that my proposed amendment stands on the footing of discrimination, which has been rejected by the committee. There is only this difference; the former question was reduced to this, shall we pay a just debt, acknowledged to be due? And the present is this, shall we pay a debt to a State, which, so far from being due, is absolutely reversed? That the State owes to you the very sum you propose to pay her. In reply to the gentleman from Connecticut, if this will embarrass the final adjustment of accounts between the United States and individual States, so will every credit-charge which there may be in the case; but this will embarrass the settlement no more than any other charge.

Mr. SENEWICK saw nothing like discrimination in the proposed amendment. He conceived that whenever the indents were collected into the State treasury, they were the property of the United States, and it was nothing but neglect in the States that they were not paid over. Ought the consequence of this neglect be to enable a State to obtain a debt against the United States, until the final settlement of accounts, when she is nothing more than the agent of the Government, by whom the business of indents was transacted?

Mr. BENSON would state a case which would show the discrimination. Suppose a creditor of the United States had received one hundred dollars in indents, as the interest of his money, and was to purchase of the State of New York land to that amount, and pass the indents in payment; but, because it is in possession of the State, it must not be funded; yet, what is in the hands of individuals shall. What is this but discrimination? But the attempt must be vain, you can never trace the security; you must accept them of those who hold them, and if your act was to restrain New York from passing them out of her treasury, the State of New York would not be obliged to obey such a law.

Mr. GERRY.—The gentleman says the State of New York would not be under any obligation to obey a law restraining her from issuing the indents in her Treasury. I should be glad to know on what principle he founds this opinion?

Mr. BENSON replied, that this was not one of those points in which Congress had a right to legislate for the States; and, therefore, any regulation on this head could not affect them.

Mr. STONE thought it would be unjust to fund the indents in the treasury of a delinquent State, and refer the one that had paid in its quota to so distant a period as the day of final settlement. He thought the General Government ought, if it funded the former, return to the latter all that had been paid in, and then they would stand on an equal footing.

Mr. LAWRENCE said, it was not on account of the State he represented that he opposed the amendment, but it was on general principles. The State of New York had paid her proportion of the requisitions with great punctuality, and perhaps no State in the Union had paid more than she had in indents, Pennsylvania excepted.

The call for the question being pretty general through the House,

Mr. HEISTER wished gentlemen to delay the decision; it was a delicate question, as it respected the customs and opinions of the people of the United States, how far it was proper to sanction the payment of interest on interest; but, beside, it was a sum of too great magnitude to perpetuate the burden upon their constituents, without more deliberation and discussion than had hitherto been given to it.

The question on Mr. GERRY's amendment being put, it passed in the negative.

Mr. HEISTER moved the rising of the committee, as he was against deciding at present on the proposition; if, however, the question was pressed, he would vote in the negative.

Mr. SHERMAN thought the interest was as meritorious as any part of the debt, and ought, of consequence, to be equally provided for.

The question on the third resolution was put, and carried in the affirmative.

The fourth resolution, on the assumption of the State debts by the United States, being under consideration,

Mr. LEE hoped this subject would be passed over for this session at least; it was a question too momentous to be hastily agreed to.

Mr. GOODHUE hoped it might not be passed over; but he had no objection to the rising of the committee.

Mr. SENEWICK said the question involved a great variety of consequences, and was deserving of the most serious attention; but as the day was too far spent to go into a discussion at this moment, he would second the motion for the committee's rising.

Whereupon the committee rose, and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 23.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they receded from the amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill providing for the enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States; and that they have agreed to a resolution, that it will be expedient to accept of the cession proposed by an act of the Legislature of North Carolina, for ceding to the United States certain Western lands therein described, on the conditions therein contained, and that when a deed shall be executed for the same, Congress express their acceptance thereof by a legislative act; to which resolution they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee appointed for the purpose, presented a bill for regulating the Post Office of the United States; which was read the first time.

The House then went again into Committee of the Whole on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. BENSON in the Chair.

The assumption of the State debts under consideration.

Mr. LIVERMORE thought this proposition one of a very extensive nature, and of which the committee, at present, had no complete idea. But why are we to use such expedition in determining upon it? The Secretary does not consider it of importance to provide for it for a long time to come. Are the creditors of the respective States, of the States themselves, clamorous for the measure? They have not, as yet, applied to Congress on this head; perhaps the creditors are satisfied with what the States have done for them. Why then are we to undertake a work of this extent, when nothing appears to show its necessity, or even propriety? Is not the task of providing for the real debts of the Union sufficiently arduous, without undertaking more, when more is unnecessary? Besides, will not the assumption of more debts than we owe disable us from doing our real creditors justice? And will they not have a right to complain of our conduct? But the merits and amount of these debts are both unascertained. It would argue a want of foresight to adopt a measure wrapped up in uncertainty.

We know there are commissioners appointed and employed in the settlement of the accounts between the individual States and the United States; let us know first from them what balances are due to the respective States, before we undertake to assume them. I think these considerations alone sufficient to induce us to suspend our determination for the present; but if we cannot pass it over regularly, and consistently with the rules of order, of which, by the by, I profess myself no judge, I hope it may be negatived.

Mr. LAWRENCE.—I view this, sir, as one of the most important subjects which can come before Congress. I conceive that it requires all the investigation and consideration which reason and the most experienced judgment can bestow. I hope, therefore, that gentlemen are prepared to enter on the discussion with candor and moderation, and furnish their associates with all the light they can reflect upon the subject.

[H. OF R.]

For my own part, after paying some attention to the measure, I must own that I am at present in favor of assuming the State debts; I think I discover great advantages resulting therefrom. I believe it will be much easier, and more productive, for one body to draw forth the resources of the Union, than it will be for many. Those resources must be drawn out for the particular purposes for which they are wanted; the debt of the General and particular Governments must be provided for, either by the General Government, or part by the General Government, and part by the particular State Governments; for I apprehend the creditors of the respective States will think their State Governments as much bound, in justice, to satisfy their claims, as the creditors of the General Government think the United States bound to satisfy theirs. Therefore it seems to follow, if the General Government does not make provision for both, that they must leave some of the resources for the satisfaction of that part for which they themselves decline to make provision. Supposing the whole must be satisfied, I am led to conclude it might be done with greater ease, less expense, and more facility, if it was all provided for under one general system. This is my general idea; and I am convinced, the more it is examined, the more it will be found beneficial to the Union.

It is well known that particular States are in the exercise of deriving revenue from excise, for the satisfaction of particular creditors; and that part of the Secretary's plan contemplates the exercise as a branch of revenue whereby to provide for the domestic debt of the United States. Perhaps, and it is highly probable, that the excise may be laid by both on the same articles; if they both go on, there will be such clashing and confusion, such prejudice and loss of revenue, that the product cannot be relied on by either; but if the debts are assumed, we can have the whole of these funds, and there is no doubt but they will be fully adequate, in this way, to the purpose for which they are wanted.

The objections made by the gentleman from New Hampshire may be easily obviated. He has mentioned that we know nothing of the state or amount of this debt. The Secretary of the Treasury, from authentic accounts in many instances, and from well grounded conjectures in others, has ascertained that all the claims of individuals upon the several States does not exceed twenty-five millions of dollars; hence, here is some certainty as to the extent of the debt; but if there is any objection on this ground, Congress may bind them to that amount, that they shall not go further.

He further objected, that it was improper to assume these debts, because we do not know the merits of the particular claimants. We must have some confidence on this subject, and suppose that when the particular States settled, liquidated, and admitted a debt, that they did not admit improper ones; the States having admitted them is our security; the merit was proved to their satisfaction.

faction, and no doubt will be to ours, provided we think proper to assume them.

He says there has been no application made to Congress, by either States or individual creditors of States. But this, sir, is no reason against the assumption. If we view it as a measure beneficial to the true interests of the United States, we are at liberty to adopt it without any such application. I imagine it will be beneficial to the State claimants; and it is unnecessary to wait for an application from them to induce us to do what will be conducive to their interest. They will be better satisfied under a permanent provision, that will exhibit full and permanent regulations, than they can be under partial State regulations. I believe there is no occasion to wait until the particular States make application, because the claims we are to assume are those of individuals against the States, and if they mean to subscribe their claims, the States cannot interfere; it is the property of the creditor, and he may do with it what he pleases; if they chose to transform their debt into a Continental debt, what has a State to do with the transaction?

The gentleman has also intimated, that if we assume the State debts, we shall embarrass the operations of the General Government with respect to the domestic creditors; but if we do not assume those debts, I think the creditors of the General Government will have a right to complain. For the interference and clashing of thirteen collections will, in all probability, occasion a deficiency in every one; the certainty of drawing any given sum from a fund thus circumstanced, is not to be relied on: will it not be injurious to the creditors of the Union to have the revenue that is to pay them their interest totally precarious? Will not their principal be diminished in full proportion?

The gentleman has admitted, that on the final adjustment of accounts, we ought to assume the balances. I suppose, if the States are not able to pay them—but I presume the settlement of accounts makes no alteration on this point. If the debts are now assumed, it will reduce those balances; if they are not assumed till after settlement, the balances will be greater. If it is proper to assume at any stage, why not assume at the first stage, when we are certain that the measure is founded in justice, and can be executed with convenience to all parties? Hence I am led to hope that the committee will ultimately adopt the resolution, though I am not anxious to hurry on a decision until the subject is well examined. I shall hear the observations of gentlemen with pleasure.

Mr. LIVERMORE begged to explain one word. What he had said with relation to the merits of the debt, did not apply to the individuals, it referred to the nature of the debt, such as whether it was contracted for general or particular defence, or for local and State purposes, with which other States had nothing to do. He supposed there was all this and more variety to be found in the State debts.

Mr. AMES expressed great regard for the candor of the committee in proceeding to discuss a subject which some gentlemen considered as of the first importance. He presumed from it, and the consideration gave him the highest gratification, that they were disposed to persevere in that line of conduct towards each other, which had hitherto so notoriously contributed to preserve that harmony in their discussions and decisions which had hitherto prevailed.

He begged permission to state one or two reasons why the committee ought to proceed in the way they were in, which he was sure would not be considered as altogether foreign. I presume, in the first place, that it is pursuing the civil order of things; that is, we consider what is to be done, before we consider how it shall be done. It is perfectly natural to ascertain what the debt is, before we declare how it shall be paid. I can hardly contemplate a change in the order of proceeding, without incurring confusion.

But there is another consideration: the manner in which the provision shall be made for the discharge of the annual interest will, in a great measure, depend on the decision of this question; because, if the committee determine that they will assume the State debts, they may proceed without paying much regard to the existing and otherwise interfering revenue laws of the several States. They would then have a clear stage, and might fit it up as they judged most convenient. They might lay such duties as they supposed were most likely to be successfully collected. But if we do not assume them, it will then be worthy of inquiry, how far we are to regard the present laws of the States respecting excise? Whether we are content to take the residue of what is left after the State collection? This will also lead to the discussion of an inveterate question between the pre-emption right of the State and of the United States, and the superiority of the general and particular creditors.

By pursuing order, we shall, I trust, come to satisfactory conclusions upon every proposition. The resolutions are simple; they do not enter too much into detail; nor are they expressed in too compact a manner. By their simplicity they are capable of fair discussion; it is what the honorable mover intended, and what I hope they will receive.

There is one other remark I would suggest; but then I would have gentlemen observe, that I barely suggest it. Perhaps if we do not assume the debts contemplated by the Secretary, we have no right to assume the funds; if we break into his general arrangement, the system is disordered, and can hardly be again connected so as to preserve its symmetry, or give it efficacy.

Mr. SHERMAN.—If we can make provision for these debts, it will be a desirable object to assume them; it will, at the same time, ease the States of a very great burden, and put all ranks of creditors on the same footing; and this last will have an effect to prevent speculation, inasmuch as there will be but one uniform object for men to trade in; there will be no difficult variety in the nature of stock. But, at the same time, I think the debts to be assumed ought to consist of those only which were incurred for common or particular defence during the last war; and not those debts which a State may have incurred for the support of its Government, the protection and encouragement of its manufactures, or for amending and opening highways, clearing the obstructions in the navigation of rivers, or any other local purpose, undertaken merely for the benefit of one or two States.

I have no objection to agreeing to the general proposition at this time; but I am not quite so well satisfied with respect to the time when the provision ought to be made for paying the interest thereon; but as that matter is not immediately before the committee, I shall not touch upon it at present.

Mr. STONE.—A strong binding force, exterior or interior, is supposed essentially necessary to keep together a Government like ours; and of all the bands of political connexion, perhaps there is none stronger than that which is formed by a uniform, compact, and efficacious chain or system of revenue. A greater thought could not have been conceived by man; and its effect, I venture to predict, if adopted by us, and carried into execution, will prove to the Federal Government walls of adamant, impregnable to any attempt upon its fabric or operations. I have viewed it with some degree of attention, and I see the subject rise into gigantic height.

I am inclined, sir, from the view I have taken, to believe that the measure is not founded in injustice; because it is an advance of credit by the United States, which the individual States are in future to compensate. And although the individual States may have gone into enormous expenses on account of their Civil Government, yet it does not appear that it will operate injustice on that account; because I suppose that the States will not have credit in a future settlement for any thing but their exertions during the war. Those who have made the greatest exertions will have the greatest credit; therefore we are to suppose that justice, in the end, will be done to all parties.

It is also very clear to me, that the United States will collect the revenue arising from the proposed funds, and pay it over to the public creditor, with more ease and less expense, under a uniform system, than could be done by the various and different regulations of the several States; but, in proportion as these reasons are cogently impressed on my mind, the objection rises the stronger to the whole system; for, in my opinion, it ought to be defended, with this point granted, that a General Government is of advantage to the people of the United States.

I shall detain the committee a very little while in examining how far the proposed scheme is connected with that idea. I think, sir, wherever the property is, there will be the power. And if the General Government has the payment of all the debts, it must, of course, have all the revenue; if it possesses the whole revenue, it is equal, in other words, to the whole power; the different States will then have little to do; important talents will not be necessary to be employed in the administration of the State Governments; if they are not found to be necessary, the fair presumption is, they will not be employed. Men of consequence and great abilities will hardly go into a Legislature where their usefulness is circumscribed to trifling or uninteresting points. What is likely to be the effect of this? I presume, that hereafter the Legislatures of particular States will be composed of men who hold their talents at a cheaper rate. The same principle will operate throughout the whole routine of State business—the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial; and the operations of the Government will partake of the weakness and imbecility of its administration. In proportion as the State Governments decline in consequence, men will look up to the General Government; and in proportion as they decline in their importance, so will the Federal Government rise in consequence. It has been very doubtful whether there can be a confederated Government where the laws are to operate on individuals, and not on States. Indeed it has been a doubt whether a Confederated Government remains, when the General Government possesses the power of the purse; and whether that circumstance does not swallow up the idea of an absolute existence of a State Government. I believe the truth of this will be demonstrated by recourse to historic facts. Every confederated Republic which has given the superintending body the power of the purse, has found every effort of the individual States insufficient to keep the compression of that band from holding them tightly together; neither exterior nor interior force has yet been able to separate the parts of a Government formed on this principle. Hence, sir, I am led to believe, that if the whole revenue of the several States is taken into the power of Congress, it will prove a band to draw us so close together, as not to leave the smallest interstice of separation.

There is another consequence which seems to result from this plan, with which my mind does not accord; it is this: that one class of men in the United States are about to bear the whole expense of the late war, and that class is the consumers of foreign articles. This is strictly true, if we except a very trifling revenue indeed, derived from the writers of post letters; and, perhaps, as trifling a one from the excise on the spirits distilled in the United States. Now, it appears to me, that the consumers of imported articles are not the only persons in the community who draw advantages from the late Revolution, or from the adoption of this efficient Government; therefore, we ought, as far as we can ascertain, endeavor to lay the burden as equally as possible upon the whole community.

I know that laying a duty on imports to a certain extent is one of the easiest modes of raising revenue; and that, in general, it will operate most equally; but it does not follow, that because it is the easiest to a certain extent, we are, therefore, to relinquish every other species of taxation, and lay the burden of the Revolution on one class of citizens alone.

There is another observation which I mean to make. It does not appear to me that the debts of the particular States are the debts of the United States. State debts, and debts of the United States, are hardly convertible terms; and I question very much, whether it is strictly within our constitutional power to levy taxes and collect duties, except it be to pay the debts of the United States. Will it be admitted that Congress can adopt any debts they think proper, whether they come within the idea of being debts contracted for the purposes of the Confederation or not? The object expressed in the Constitution is simply to pay the debts of the United States. Can Congress, by their own authority, saddle the Union with a debt of this magnitude, independent of the particular powers they derive from the Constitution, and then justify the collection of taxes under the general powers of the Constitution? Suppose the United States were to levy a large sum in taxes, without an object, would this exercise of authority be within the defined powers of the Constitution? Would it be right to say, that we shall hereafter be largely in debt, but we are not yet so; and, therefore, we must collect a great quantity of revenue? The scheme of the Secretary proposes either this very thing, or something extremely analogous. The State debts which we are to provide for are not the debts of the United States, and very possibly may never be.

If this is granted to be a principle of our Constitution, it may be a dangerous one. If Congress say they want money for some purpose which they conceive to be salutary to the United States, but which, at the same time, is not a constitutional object of their power, have they a right to levy duties for such purpose? And if they have, where is the limit to which they may not go? Or where is the boundary by which they are restrained.

Before this scheme is adopted, it is my opinion that the sense of the several States, and the individual creditors, ought to be obtained. I think there are a variety of debts in the several States; their extent is as different as the provision made for their security. The credit of the States is materially different; perhaps in consequence of the amount of their debts, and the means of their payment; not, however, that this is uniformly the case. The value of the debts of the State of Maryland may be different from that of the debts of New York and Pennsylvania. I believe, in Maryland, the funds appropriated for the payment of the State debt are neither so ample or punctually paid as funds provided by Virginia or Pennsylvania, the two adjoining States, for the payment of their debts; yet the paper securities of Maryland sell in market for twice the sum than the securities of either of those States. I suppose the paper must be rated at what it sells for in the market; and when men are asked to make their selection as to which they will prefer, they will forego what brings least, and accept of what contributes most; they will be governed by the market price of the several kinds of stock; then I infer from hence, that there may be a partial adoption of the scheme by the several States, and individual creditors of the States. It would be well to examine the consequences of such an event. I believe the committee will have no doubt in assenting to this proposition—that whenever the faith of a nation is pledged to pay its just debts, it must perform the promise with good will and alacrity. We have sufficient proof of this by the speedy adoption of several resolutions on this head by this very body. But let us suppose, sir, that the individual creditors of Pennsylvania or Maryland refuse to adopt your plan, and the State refuses to notice it; or that the majority of the creditors of those States refuse to subscribe to your loan; one of two consequences must arise: either a great part of the United States, having agreed to adopt the plan of Congress, will remit in their exertions to pay their State creditors, and, by that means, force the remaining creditors into a compliance with the terms of the scheme, or the States, where the creditors do not subscribe, will be forced to levy taxes for their individual creditors, and contribute, at the same time, to pay the debts thus assumed. Suppose the State of Massachusetts is pleased with the scheme, and thinks it right, but its creditors do not subscribe, will she go on and levy taxes to discharge the debt? Suppose the creditors of Maryland should refuse to subscribe, and Maryland disagree to the scheme; suppose a majority of the creditors and States should reject the scheme, and it fail, then have to begin to tax again, having lost all this time. Suppose a majority of the States were to adopt the scheme, and a State and its citizens refuse, then this State must pay as much, by ex-ternal taxes, as Congress are able to collect, and all this they must bear without the consolation of thinking it equal. Such a situation must involve this country in serious circumstances. A State, thus circumstanced, would bear its burden with great pain, and very great impatience.

Suppose an individual creditor, in any State, should refuse to subscribe to the Continental loan, the State must go on with its process of taxation to collect the money for this unsubscribed part. Here the expense of taxation would be equal to what it is at present; but its relative proportion, with the sum raised, would be increased much to the dissatisfaction of the citizens. In this case, that ease in taxation, which has been contemplated, would not take effect.

These are the reflections which have arisen in my mind, and really I did not think that we should have got so far on with this business by this time; we have been expeditious indeed; it will not be doubted that we are wise politicians, yet it must be granted we are bold ones. We have, without the assistance of any part of the community, except an officer of Government, and the information we have obtained from each other, adopted resolutions affecting the dearest interests of the people, without affording them an opportunity of letting us know their sentiments. Shall we go on to new-model all the revenues throughout the United States, to alter the disposition of every State's scheme of finance, without consulting them; giving cause of chagrin to the State creditors, and of alarm to our constituents and their State Governments generally? It appears to me to be a hazardous thing.

I will make one observation more, which the last has suggested. The community might have adopted, willingly, had they been consulted, a measure which they may object to and oppose, if decided upon without their knowledge.

I do not see, nor has it been proved to the satisfaction of my mind, that there is any occasion for using expedition in completing any part of the funding plan. I have not changed that sentiment which I mentioned in the beginning. If we lay and collect taxes, we shall be in a situation to pay our debts; but a funding scheme will not make us a farthing the richer, however elevated on the scale of nations it may make us appear. We often adopt propositions with the firmest reliance on their truth and propriety; yet some thought and communication, with a little experience, will induce us to wonder how we ever could have conceived them right.

These are the suggestions of my mind, so far as I have examined the subject, and it appears to be a step which we cannot take, at this time, with any prospect of advantage.

Mr. CLYMER said, that although the assumption of the State debts appeared to him a measure of a federal complexion, and necessary to the preservation of the Union, yet it required considerable caution. At present no very important objection occurred to him against it. Those mentioned by the gentleman from Maryland, he thought, admitted of an easy answer; they were, principally: That we were required to assume the unauthorized, as well as the authorized State debts; which never could be a charge against the United States: That it would be difficult to find the means of satisfying both the Federal and State debts consolidated: And that if the power of providing for their own debts was taken from the States, they would be brought to too great a dependency on the United States.

To the first, he answered, that what we assumed of the unauthorized debts of the States would be sufficiently covered in the gross demand which they would have against the United States, when their accounts should be finally made up. To the second, he answered, that Congress could not assume the State debts without assuming, at the same time, those very means which otherwise the States would employ in extinguishing their debts, were they left on their own hand; and that, in this case, it would be as easy to satisfy both species of debt as one. On the third objection he observed, that if a condition of absolute dependency on the General Government was to follow this measure, it would be only the anticipation of a necessary event. For, on the final settlement of accounts, whatever debts were then due to the States must be assumed, and in like manner provided for by Congress, in taking the taxation out of the hands of the States. Other objections, and perhaps material, might occur; but he saw none at that time that militated forcibly against the measure.

Mr. SHERMAN.—It appears to me, that the objections of the gentleman from Maryland are not sufficient to prevent our adoption of this proposition. His objection is, that it will give a greater degree of importance to the General Government, while it will lessen the consequence of the State Governments. Now, I do not believe it will have that effect. I consider both Governments as standing on the broad basis of the people; they were both instituted by them, for their general and particular good. The Representatives in Congress draw their authority from the same source as the State Legislatures; they are both of them elected by the people at large, the one to manage their national concerns, and the other their domestic, which they find can be better done by being divided into lesser communities, than the whole Union; but to effect the greater concerns, they have confederated; therefore, every thing which strengthens the Federal Government, and enables it to answer the end for which it was instituted, will be a desirable object with the people. It is well known, we can extend our authority no further than to the bounds the people have assigned. If we abuse this power, doubtless, the people will send others to correct our faults; or, if necessary, alter the system; but we have every reason to believe the people will be pleased with it, and none suppose that the State Governments will object. They are the supreme power, within their own jurisdiction, and they will have authority over the States, in all cases, not given to the General Government, notwithstanding the assumption of the State debts. If it was a question between two different countries, and we were going to give the British Parliament power, by assuming our debts, of levying what taxes they thought proper, and the people of America were to have no voice in the appointment of the officers who were to administer the affairs of Government, the experiment would be dangerous to this country; but, as the business is to be conducted by ourselves, there can be no ground for apprehension. The people of the United States are like masters presiding to their servants the several branches of business they would have each to perform. It would not comport with their interest if the Federal Government was to interfere with the Government of particular States; while, on the other hand, it would injure their interests to restrict the General Government from performing what the Federal Constitution allows them. It is the interest of each and of the whole, that they both should be supported within their proper limits.

Another objection is, that we are to pay the whole by imposts, and that this mode will be unequal. I apprehend this is not well founded; because the consumers of imported goods comprise all the inhabitants of the United States, and the consumption is, in a great degree, proportioned to the abilities of the citizens. The rich man, with his dependants, consumes more; there is more waste, too, in such a family, than in the economy and frugality of the poor. If this be the fact, the rich contribute revenue in a proportion, and of consequence, the burden of the tax is borne generally and equally, by those who derive benefit from the late Revolution.

Another objection is, that we are not authorized by the Constitution to assume the State debts. By the Confederation, Congress were authorized to raise money; but not being able to effect this, in an immediate and direct manner, they did it immediately, through the intervention of the State Governments; so that, in fact, these debts are to be looked upon as the absolute debts of the Union; however, I should have no objection to qualify the mode of expressing our opinion, in such way as to confine the assumption to those debts alone which were contracted by the States for the common defence. Those debts, as was observed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, will ultimately be assumed, and it is as well to be charged with them, in the first instance, especially if doing so, in the first instance, will promote the general good.

Another objection is, that the debts of the States are of different value. I take it, sir, that no debt will be assumed, but what is liquidated and reduced to specie value, and, although we differ in nominal accounts, yet a dollar is every where equal. As to the inequality of the market rate, it may have been occasioned by some States not having made equal provision for their debts, when compared to the provision of other States; but as the debts are all equally meritorious, an equality of provision ought to be made. That some creditors have heretofore suffered, is no reason why they should continue to suffer; so I can see no weight in this objection. But he supposes that some creditors will prefer holding the State for their money, rather than the United States; if it should be the case, it will make no difference on the final settlement, because the States will only be debited for that part of the debt which their creditors had subscribed into the general fund. But I see no good reason for supposing that the creditors of the States will refuse to subscribe. They have an election, it is true, but the terms must appear to them so advantageous, considering all things, as to induce them to accept the plan.

I have no difficulty, in my mind, respecting the assumption; but as to the time of doing it, I am not so well satisfied. I have not a doubt of our ability, because if the whole debt must be paid by the joint efforts of the State and General Government, the same money may be raised, with greater ease, by the General Government alone; this point being conceded, I shall add nothing further at this time.

Mr. BURKE flattered himself with an expectation of obtaining the assistance of his friends in enabling him to make up his mind on the present question; but, hitherto, he had been unable to receive any communications from that quarter. If he erred, in the opinion he entertained at present, he hoped it would be attributed to the true cause, want of sufficient information to make up his judgment, and not a desire to protract a business perhaps intended for the public good.

The State I belong to has a large debt, which they have contracted in their exertions for the common cause; this, I think, Congress ought to take upon themselves. That State was a continued scene of action for several years. In 1775, the Tories broke out, and the State struggled to suppress them; in 1776, the Cherokee Indians and the British attacked us in front and rear, as if by agreement, both on one day. The British fleet and army assaulted Sullivan's Island and received a total defeat; were not the United States benefited as much by that victory as the State of South Carolina? To be sure they were. It was fighting for their liberty and independence, as much as our own. In the year 1778, the war was brought to our door again, and again we defeated the enemy; was not this fighting the battles of America? The affair of the Black Swamp, the actions under Gates, the loss of Charleston, the exertions under Greene—our debts were contracted for these purposes, and by our struggles with the enemy, whom we weakened, and finally overcame, we contributed to the establishment of the independence of America. To draw a distinction between the Continental debt and debts contracted in this manner, is establishing a distinction without a difference. But notwithstanding I am well satisfied of the justice of the claim, I have my apprehension that we are running on too fast; we ought to consider our ways and means, before we undertake a business of this enormous magnitude. I am confident we do not know the consequence of this business, and therefore ought to weigh it well. If any gentleman will move a postponement of it, I will vote for that, because I wish not to be too precipitate. The political consequences which may arise to the State Governments give me some alarm, and that makes me still more desirous of the postponement.

Mr. GOODRUE.—The State from whence I came was unencumbered with debt, before the late war, and now they are burdened with a heavy one, which they acquired, in consequence of the advances they made to enable the Union to carry it on; the debts of this, and the other States are, in every respect, of the same nature with those of the Union; and must, like them, be paid. The present question then appears to me to be this; shall they be paid by the States, in their individual or collective capacity? The gentleman near me, (Mr. BURKE,) though he acknowledges the justice, seems afraid to assume them, lest the ways and means should prove inadequate; but he will find that the Continental Government is more able to draw out the resources of this country with effect, than the different State Governments are, in their separate capacity.

In some States, the interest of their debt has been paid by the duties of impost and tonnage; the Congress have taken those, and now it is in contemplation to take the excise also, which is the other fund employed to raise money to pay the State creditors. That being gone, for I suppose the two Governments will avoid doubly taxing the same articles, the States must have recourse to direct taxation. I do not know how agreeable direct taxes are in some of the States; but we have tried it pretty fully in Massachusetts, and know what is likely to be its consequence. The late insurrection was occasioned by them. As Massachusetts cannot go to direct taxes without an unwarrantable risk, she must continue the operation of her excise laws; and here I mean to refer gentlemen's recollection to the situation of 1787; what was it gave rise to the late change in Government? It was the interfering regulations of commerce, and the intercourse between States. It originated, if I mistake not, in the State of Virginia, in consequence of a variation in the regulations between her and Maryland. If such consequences as a change in the National Government have flowed from this cause, how careful ought we to be to avoid it in future; yet I do not see how this can be done, unless we embrace the State creditors in our provision; besides, the interference in the collection may justly be feared to work the destruction of both; and the creditors of the Union, in my opinion, will have greater security by this means, and, consequently, be better satisfied to have the whole blended.

I presume no gentleman can doubt but the debts of the States are as meritorious as those of the Union. I believe, if there is any difference, it is in favor of the State debts; because, generally, the States were more economical in contracting, and generally received a more valuable consideration for their money than the United States. But without dwelling on this point, I contend, that where the resources go the debts must follow.

Mr. FRIZZIMON.—The proposition before us is no doubt a very important one, yet liable to some objections; but the one mentioned by the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. BURKE) is not of very considerable weight; he thinks we ought to go into the investigation of the ways and means before we adopt it. He should recollect, the Secretary does not contemplate an immediate provision for this object; nothing is intended to be paid on this debt, before the year 1792; nor even then unless the creditors agree to subscribe upon the terms held out; we shall consequently have abundant time to know the disposition of the State creditors, and to obtain the requisite revenue.

A doubt has been suggested, whether there is a probability of obtaining the consent of the State creditors; we can only judge of this from the probability there is, that men can discover, and will pursue their own interest; but there is reason from what the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. STONE) has said, to believe this consent.

The value of the securities, he asserts, is different in the different States; and he stated it as a fact, that in Pennsylvania, although the interest of the State debt was well funded, and tolerably well paid, yet their securities never rose above eight shillings on the pound in the market; when he alleged that the debt of Maryland sold for twice that sum. I apprehend he must have included the interest due on them, which increased their value without adding any thing nominally to the certificates. Now, if securities well funded, with the interest regularly paid, have never risen to more than eight shillings in the pound, I suppose they will not increase in price when the funds upon which they were funded are taken away, and when even what remains will be rendered less certain by the interference of the General Government; I mean the article of excise. I have no doubt, but under these circumstances, the State creditors will subscribe with cheerfulness. When the domestic debt is funded, the most productive revenues will be taken from the States, and the ability of the individual States to provide for the remainder will undoubtedly be lessened; in either case, the people will have to pay the whole interest. It is admitted, that the United States can collect the revenue for the whole, as well as they can for the proportion for which they have engaged to provide, while the ability of the States is diminished, and there accrues a deficiency by the various operations of the State and General Governments. I apprehend, the State creditors must go unsatisfied, which would not be just with respect to them; because their debts are as much debts of merit, as the greater part of the debts of the United States. The evidences are generally in the hands of those who furnished supplies during the late war, and have not been transferred; having this just claim, they will contribute with great reluctance to the payment of the creditors of the United States, if they are unprovided for; they will view them with a jealous eye, as wresting from them what they have long been accustomed to consider as their own.

There is another argument which I admit ought to have its weight; that is, the eventual operation of this system, and its immediate effects. I can answer for Pennsylvania, that it would be unfavorable to that State, because she has contributed her full proportion of the expense of the war, and has since redeemed more of her debt than any other State perhaps had the capacity to do. She owes but a small proportion of what the State debt is calculated to be; much less, I believe, than what the Secretary has supposed; but if the debts are assumed, I believe more will be collected from the State in the additional duty than the interest on the debt she owes. Her debt is supposed to be two millions two hundred thousand dollars, on which she is paying an interest of six per cent; this amounts to one hundred and thirty-two thousand of dollars annually. The aggregate of the State debts is supposed to be twenty-five millions; the proportion to be paid by Pennsylvania, one-seventh of which at four per cent, to one hundred and forty-three thousand dollars; moreover, Pennsylvania will have to account eventually with the United States, for the premiums given to induce the reduction of interest; so that in the end her contribution will be much larger than if she continued to pay her own creditors. I hope, however, whatever inequalities may arise, in the first instance, they will, on the final adjustment of accounts, be done away, and corrected; retribution must at last be made, and it is under this idea that I agree to the proposition now before you.

There is another reason, which also induces me to agree to the assumption. Every gentleman must believe, when we consider the nature of the domestic debt, and the manner in which it was contracted, that by far the greatest part of it is in the hands of the citizens who reside near the centre of the Union. If we confine our revenue to this part alone, we must draw considerable sums from the extremes of the Union; and what inducements do you hold out to the citizens at those extremities to co-operate with you in the faithful collection of money, to be sent out of their country? On the other hand, as the greatest part of the State debts are owing by the States at the extremity of the Union, if they are assumed, the money which is collected in those parts will be retained, in order to pay the interest due on their State debt; by which means the beneficial effects of the funding system will be more generally and equally felt throughout every part of the Union.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina.—I admit the importance of the present question, but I cannot permit myself to doubt but Congress will decide it upon the principles of honesty and justice. Nothing can appear to me to be more clear, than that a State debt being incurred in the common defence, should be made a common burden; we should consider ourselves as settling the affairs of a great family, and be studious to equalize the task necessary to be borne by every one.

My colleague has properly stated the great sufferings and hardships of the country from which we come; but he might have added, that our State had it in her power to discharge the debt she has incurred. The confiscated property would have brought into her treasury three times the sum she owed; but in consequence of the recommendation of Congress, they remitted the greatest part of the estates in that predicament. If, therefore, in consequence of an act of Congress, the State disabled herself from discharging the debts she owed, it is the duty of Congress to assist her now; but it was an adventitious thing that the State incurred the debt, because the demands were really against the Continent; but the Continent being unable to pay, and the State desirous of giving every assistance in her power, assumed those demands, and made herself liable to the payment; but now a Government being formed, possessed of sufficient resources, it ought to take back the debts really due by it, though assumed by the States for the support of the national credit. I conceive the situation of the State Governments to be the same as if a person had accepted a bill for the honor of the drawer, to preserve his reputation, but with a design that the drawer should ultimately pay it. The demand of the creditor arose from services or supplies for Continental purposes; but the State agreed to stand in the place of the Continent, till the Conti-ment should be able to pay it. When it is examined, it will be found that a great part of the debt of South Carolina was incurred in this manner. Our State debt is very considerable in consequence, and every possible exertion has been made to reduce it, as well as to pay the interest. The State issued indents, in payment of the interest, making them receivable in payment of duties. This gave them a circulation, and kept up their value remarkably well; in 1784 and 1785, they depreciated only twelve or thirteen per cent.; but the distress of that State has been such, since that time, with the expense and ruin of the war, the great load of private debts, and some other causes, that these securities have amazingly depreciated; and at the last session of the Legislature, such was the sense of their exhausted state, and of the obligation which Congress lay under to assume the debts contracted for Continental purposes, that they made no provision for them. I wish to be indulged in a remark upon one observation. It seems to be admitted, by every gentleman, that ultimately this measure ought to take place; but, some say, not at present. We have been told that a great part of the Continental debt has been purchased up by the speculators, who will, by the funding system, reap all the profit, while the poor men, who were original creditors, are obliged to go unrewarded. If we postpone this business, I fear that the State debts will find their way into the same channel, and then, perhaps, we may have the claim set up, for repaying them the difference between the nominal value and what they may sell for. If gentlemen are desirous of putting a stop to speculation, assume the State debts, and their original holders may be induced to retain them in their hands.

The honorable gentleman from Maryland (Mr. STONE) has said a great deal about the States refusing to give their assent to the measure. I do not know what the States, as States, have to do in the business; beside, if I recollect rightly, that gentleman was opposed, at the last session, to admit of instructions from the people or the States; why is he now so desirous of their advice? The creditor of the State, I presume, cannot be compelled to receive his money of the State, if he chooses to transfer it into other hands; if he thinks it best to apply to the Continent for payment, the State cannot prevent him. He asks you, likewise, what is to be done if an individual declines to subscribe? Is the State to go on and levy taxes to pay him. I answer no; let the State pay him his demand, and then stand in his shoes and receive his demand from the Continent.

He has said, we may be wise politicians, but we are bold ones for going on so fast, without further information than what we derive from the officers of the Government, and among ourselves. Sir, I believe it is a good very way to come at information to attend to the debates on this floor; I conceive more information is to be obtained here than in any other place in the United States. Gentlemen rise one by one, and give us their opinion of the sense of their constituents, and a narrative of facts, which throws sufficient light on our path, to guide us without waiting to acquire a broken and uncertain clew; but I have not seen any thing like hurry in this business. We have hitherto proceeded with great deliberation, and I presume it is not the wish of any honorable gentleman to hurry on with boldness or rashness to the decision of the present question; so that the charge of these honorable gentlemen is totally unfounded.

Mr. GERRY thought the welfare of the community, in a high degree, involved in the present question; and, therefore, hoped it would be considered with attention, and decided upon the purest principles of justice and good policy.

It has been said, that Congress have no power to assume the State debts. This leads us to an inquiry into the power of Congress, and by referring to the Constitution we find that Congress are authorized to lay and collect taxes, &c., to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States. If Congress have the power to pay debts, they have an implied right to examine what those debts are, and if they have been contracted for the common defence there is no doubt but they are the debts of the United States; but supposing Congress unauthorized by the powers cited, they are, by the general clause, giving to Congress powers to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution all the powers of the Constitution, or of any department or officer under it, fully authorized to judge of and determine the debts of the United States.

In order, then, to determine whether the debts of the States are the debts of the United States, let us consider who are the holders of the State certificates. Some of the State creditors were officers and soldiers of the late army. The first army of the United States was raised, armed, and clothed by the States. The officers and soldiers thereof have as strong a claim on your justice for the money due them, as those who were established at the close of the war. They will not acknowledge any difference, from their being enlisted by a State instead of Continental authority; yet that is the only distinction, for they were adopted by Congress, formed into one army, fought the same battles, and shared in every hardship. Another part of the State creditors consists of men who furnished supplies for the Union during the late war. Most of them are of this class, and can any one, who recollects this circumstance, possibly imagine a difference between them and what are called Continental creditors? Part of the State debts were Continental debts, assumed by the States on the earnest recommendations of Congress. And other parts were occasioned by the States having undertaken, for their particular defence, expeditions against the common enemy, or having paid interest to their citizens on the Continental debt.

Gentlemen who reflect on the nature of the State Governments must be satisfied that it is impossible they should have incurred such immense debts on account of their civil lists and local institutions. On the contrary, it must be admitted, that every State has, by taxes and duties, collected more than was sufficient to defray its own expenses; the surplus has been invariably applied to the discharge of the interest or extinguishment of the principal debt incurred during the late war for general defence. Hence it must appear, that the debts now due by any State to its creditors are less than the aggregate of her demands against the Union. If, therefore, we assume the whole of their debts, we shall find they have still large demands against the Union.

Let us suppose, as stated by the gentleman from Maryland, that some of the State creditors will subscribe to the loan, and that others will not; where is the force of the objection? Let the State receive of the General Government interest for the unsubscribed part, and pay it to the non-subscribing creditors; but there is little doubt that every creditor will subscribe.

It was said the measure would raise the importance of the Union, and tend to depress the States. If it had that tendency I should oppose it; because I conceive that the Constitutional balance between the Union and States ought to be preserved. I view the Constitutions of the United States and individual States as forming a great political machine, in which the small wheels are as essential as the large; and if the former are deranged, the system must be destroyed. I humbly conceive a contrary policy will have this effect; for, suppose the United States should refuse to assume the State debts, there is no doubt but Congress can make provision for the punctual payment of the holders of Continental certificates; but it is questionable whether the States can, each of them, make provision for their respective creditors; in case of their inability it will produce a clamor against them.

The State creditors will have a high opinion of the honesty, integrity, and abilities of the General Government, while they will entertain a contrary opinion with respect to the State Government. Every such creditor will exert himself to support the former, and join in the clamor against the latter; they would allege that the State Governments were expensive and unjust; and it appears to me that the enemies of the State Governments would thus have a favorable opportunity, which their art and address would improve, to abolish the State constitutions. Should the National Government be disposed to depress the State Governments, I ask whether the States would not be better able to resist if they were clear of, than if encumbered with a debt? It is a common maxim, out of debt out of danger; but here gentlemen seem to reverse it, in debt out of danger. I cannot, therefore, agree with them.

I presume it is the wish of every gentleman to preserve the peace and harmony of the Union, and I submit to them whether this effect is most likely to result from assuming or rejecting the State debts. If you reject the measure, you establish two contending parties, the Continental creditors, and State creditors. The latter will oppose every measure of the General Government which they suppose is intended, in prejudice of themselves, to promote the interest of the former. It will sow discord among the citizens of the Union, tending to defeat the operation of both Federal and State Governments. From this I infer that a regard to the interest of the Continental creditors ought to induce us to agree to the assumption of the State debts; for the States, in making provision for their own creditors, will be induced to extend their excise, as the only means of raising revenue, to all those articles which the General Government contemplates; hence will arise such clashing and interference as will involve both revenues in confusion, and defeat the collection. There is also danger that it might extend to injure the collection of impost; whereas a uniformity in the excise system would make it more productive, and tend to increase the impost also.

Some apprehension has been expressed that the State debts may not have been fairly liquidated. I should think, from a knowledge of the economy of the States, that they were more strictly liquidated than the Federal debt. The creditors in Massachusetts have had their accounts adjusted on as strict principles as could be adopted, and I suppose the other States have acted in the same manner.

It was also said that we were unacquainted with the ability of the Union, and therefore it is improper to pledge the public faith for the payment of a debt which possibly may exceed that ability. I do not now, nor did I ever despair of the ability of the United States to pay their debts. Our finances, to be sure, are deranged; but we are taking measures to extricate ourselves from the evils resulting from such a situation. We are not to be deterred from ascertaining the amount of what we owe, because we have not at present revenue to pay the whole interest. Under Secretary's report, that we are capable of paying two-thirds of the interest. With increasing resources, and a gradual diminution of the capital, we may soon have it in our power to discharge the remainder. If we can now pay one-half, or two-thirds, let us undertake it, and no more; because I would never subject this Government to a failure in its engagements; when our abilities increase, we can undertake what we are at this moment unable to perform.

The Secretary goes on the principle of supporting the public contracts; he admits of no preference among the Continental creditors; and I shall be opposed to the giving any advantage to the injury of the State creditors. It will not be reasonable that a State should give up her resources for paying the interest on her debt, until her creditors are put on an equal footing with the Continental creditors; she requires this in justice, and asks nothing further.

I have no objection to the fullest discussion of this proposition when before us; but I think the present is not the proper time to consider it.

Mr. LAWRENCE.—Much has already been said on this subject; but much, in my opinion, yet remains to be said; and, as the usual hour of adjournment has arrived, I will move you, sir, that the committee rise.

Whereupon the committee rose, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 24.

The bill for regulating the Post Office of the United States was read a second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

PUBLIC CREDIT.

The House again formed itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. BENSON in the Chair. The assumption of the State debts under consideration.

Mr. STONE.—I did not suppose myself capable of perceiving all the advantages and disadvantages that may arise from this scheme; but were I capable, I should have candor enough to give all my ideas to the committee. I am not taking a side-like counsel at the bar, but shall consider the arguments on the one side and on the other. I shall not criminate; but would, in general, observe that I think those gentlemen do well who examine with candor each side of the question; and I hope this committee will be superior to a contrary conduct.

I do not wish to wait for positive instructions; not could I have disobeyed such instructions if given, unless they were contrary to the principles of morality. God forbid that either myself or the gentleman from South Carolina should reject the opinion or instructions of our constituents; I should be mortified if I had expressed such an idea, or felt such a sentiment.

It is true, I was against declaring in the Constitution that such should be binding, because it would affect the validity of the laws; they would no longer depend on having been passed as the Constitution directs; but their validity would depend on the proof of instructions. I never said the advice we should so receive would not convey light to this body.

I did think this measure not warranted by any clause in the Constitution. It has been urged that we can adopt what debts we pleased to say are for the general welfare; and, therefore, we may adopt the State debts. Now I admit that legally we may declare what are the debts of the United States; but not what shall be the debts of the United States. Congress can say that the State debts are the debts of the United States, if they choose to be guilty of that fallacy. If they say they are not the debts of the United States, but shall be, what is this done for—the general welfare? No; the particular welfare of the States exclusively benefited. If a State should involve herself in debt, can Congress assume the debt, and say it is for the general welfare? A State, according to that idea, might be bribed into obedience to the measures of the Federal Government; for a State might involve itself in debt, and then, to free itself from the incumbrance, become troublesome, and leave it to the option of Congress to bribe her compliance by assuming the debt, or exert force; the former would generalize rally be least expensive. I do not say that this will be the effect; but we know that things more strange have come to pass. Most indubitably we set a precedent that might warrant such practices; it is, at least, throwing out the bait; and consequently it would militate against the peace, happiness, and independency of this Government. I presume, as I conceived in the beginning, that the measure cannot be defended without taking it for granted that it is necessary, in order to support this Constitution, to carry its powers into operation as far as they will go. The gentleman from Connecticut says he cannot conceive, that as long as the Governments remain within the line of their duty, that which strengthens the United States will affect the strength of the State Governments. When power is granted, in certain proportions, to two Governments, I cannot conceive the increase of the power of one in any other way than as a depression of the other, unless new authorities are derived to either from the abundant source of the people. But if we add to the strength, and extend the energy of the General Government, by the adoption of measures which the Constitution nowhere contemplates, you will destroy the balance of power which the Constitution distributed between the Government of the United States and the State Governments. Was it the intention of the framers of this Government, and does their work contain the idea that the Union should assume the debts of the particular States? Will it give the General Government a greater degree of power? I apprehend it may; if, then, it be a power not contemplated in the Constitution, is it not an assumed power? This deduction is clear to my mind.

I admitted the convenience of this mode of collecting duties, that it might be more easy and less expensive; but because that is the case, it does not follow that I am to give it my consent. It will be very convenient for the United States to pay the consolidated debt of the Union and particular States. The State Governments will get rid of a burden; but afterwards the power of those Governments would not be very useful; it might, however, still continue necessary that the State Governments should exist; and existing, they must be some expense to the people. Suppose three or four thousand pounds annually should be sufficient to defray that expense, might it not be urged that the collection of even this small revenue was a baneful interference, and injuriously clashing with the collections of the General Government? And would it not be a good reason why the United States should pay to each of them a certain annual sum for their support, making them altogether dependent on Congress? After this, it might be found convenient to destroy the State Governments altogether—why not? The people having no use for them, would justly reduce them. Would it not be very convenient to have an universal Judiciary for the sake of uniformity, and from motives of economy? If you have a double Judiciary, it is almost impossible to avoid a clashing in their authorities.

Why not sink the lesser in the greater? Perhaps gentlemen, in a little time, may think it very inconvenient to have such frequent elections; and the doctrine of convenience will extend the period to seven or ten years. The most convenient would be to elect a man for life, and suffer the Legislature afterwards to fill up the vacancies; by this means the people will be left to pursue their habits of industry; they will labor undisturbed with the cares of Government. Nay, for a people who have parted with their liberty, the most convenient Government is an arbitrary one. There ends your doctrine of convenience.

It has been proved that we shall come to this at last; that when the accounts of the United States are settled, all the debts which have been contracted for the general welfare will be credited to the several States, and cancelled by the United States; very true. He was right as far as his observation went, but in the full latitude, it is not true; because all the debts contracted by the individual States were not for Continental purposes. It never can be true that we shall adopt all the State debts, authorized or unauthorized. If, in your settlement, you confine yourself to the admission of authorized debts, then the debt which you are hereafter to assume will extend no further than the authorized debt; so that it will not come to this at last—it will partly come to it.

It has been proved, that if this plan is carried into execution, it will probably produce injustice. I conceive we must do some injustice whether we adopt the scheme or not; because, if we do not adopt it, it is highly presumable that some States will have to bear a burden beyond what is their proportion, compared with other States. Some others will, of a moral certainty, be creditors of the United States; when, if it were possible to get the accounts adjusted, they ought to have credit instantly for the balance due. Massachusetts, for example, may have undertaken two millions beyond her proportion; she ought to have credit accordingly; but it is impossible, because the accounts are not only not settled, but the ratio of apportionment is unknown. But if, on the contrary, you take the other alternative, you work injustice; you undertake to pay unauthorized as well as authorized debts: to pay States having unauthorized debts, you levy taxes upon others that have no such claims. Suppose, for example, all the money that was expended in the Penobscot expedition be demanded under the assumption; and suppose that this is an unauthorized claim to a very considerable amount, will not the State of Massachusetts have credit for all that sum, although at a future liquidation, it should appear that not a farthing was due to her for that or any other exertion? Will not this be doing injustice to every State but those in this supposed situation?

You will know better, by and by, how far the proportion of your exertions was beyond that proportion of exertion which was your duty to perform. You will know where the expenditures exceeded the authority; but can you know it now? You neither know the proportion of any State, nor the unauthorized expense which individual States have gone into, and which was not gone into for the benefit of the United States. Hence it appears, in a certain latitude, the assertions are not true. Compare the scheme in justice, the result is this: you will be as nearly right in deciding as if you threw up for it.

Gentlemen should consider there were great disproportions in the exertions of the States; some were in the midst of the rage of war, and therefore their exertions were considerable. I am inclined to an opinion that these exertions, in every part, like water sought their own level. When the war raged in Virginia, just before York and Gloucester were taken, the army was in want of necessities; Virginia was exhausted, and could not supply the necessary provisions; from this circumstance gentlemen might be led to believe that the exertions of Virginia were superior to those of Maryland; I do not believe it. On that memorable occasion, everything we had was put within the power of the Government; the inhabitants were not left a spare blanket, a bushel of corn, or a single beef; but the consequence was the army was supplied; and from the answer of the commander-in-chief, it appears that the subsequent success of our troops was bottomed on the exertions of Maryland. From circumstances of this kind I am induced to think, when you come to settle the accounts, you will find those States which were not the most exposed contributed their full proportion of supplies.
